WASHINGTON COLLEGE MAGAZINE

The Rise & Fall Of The Chester River

by J. J. [illegible]

[illegible]

Now We Begin Again... And Again

As we scurry around Bunting Hall to put this issue to bed, the first freshmen are unloading cars, looking hopeful, looking lost. What an atmosphere of arrival there is in these late summer days. The campus is still marred by construction but at last it is obvious that a phoenix is rising quickly from the ashes—mud, that is. And in the process of all the digging, bulldozers uncovered the foundation of the original College building. Just another reminder of how long this place has been welcoming new faces in the fall, with all the attendant hopes, dreams, and anticipation of beginnings.

My hope is that many of you will rediscover Washington College this year. If you haven't come home lately, this is the time to do it. Don't wait for an alumni citation...come now, while the Chester is at its loveliest, and the leaves on the Elm are poised to turn gold.

All of those listed in the Report of Gifts section deserve a special mention of thanks. They enable us to continue to celebrate our beginnings and to look to the future with assurance of the many arrivals yet to come.

Letters

You and your staff are to be congratulated on producing a magazine that speaks well of your institution. This is the first copy I have received and very much enjoyed it.

Of particular interest to me was your feature article on "What Is The Role of Greeks On Campus?" (Summer '89 issue)

Being in the center of things in my own fraternity, I have seen the changes come about that you speak of in the article, and have served and continue to serve on several national committees that promote alcohol abuse education, scholarship, leadership, and certainly philanthropy, among others.

Great progress has been made among all national fraternities during the past ten years or more, and the momentum continues. There will always be areas where improvements must be made, and we continue to work on those each day. We in the fraternity world are providing, more so than ever before, a place for a young man to find those things that are really important in life, namely being a part of a group, working together for common goals, helping those less fortunate, making decent grades, caring about another person, representing the institution in good maner, and making life-long friends, to mention a few. At the same time the greek system is developing loyal alumni, those who will return in the years to come, who will support the institution and will some day send their sons and daughters for the same experience.

Your article was very refreshing, encouraging, and most importantly, fair.

What in the world did the Sigs do to Sue De Pasquale? Whatever it was, she got in her licks with her exposé on "The Greek Tradition."

As far as those other fraternities and sororities whose glorious civic and academic contributions were explored in full detail, I can only hope they will survive the horrible defamation they have suffered through the heathen antics at East Hall.

Vandalism certainly is one of the less tolerable traditions of campus life, but if Theta Pooh-Bah Brian Kelly really feels his sect is in peril for another's actions, surely Mike Jenkins' KAs can track down a good lawyer to go after "millions of dollars" in damages.

Dean McIntire continues to temper tough sanctions with an open mind toward the future. She could have thrown me on the rack for the parking tickets alone.

After reading the article about Greeks on campus, I became more and more upset about how little space Alpha Chi Omega was given.

Not only was there very little copy about Beta Pi, but there were photographs of the other two sororities but not of Alpha Chi Omega.

Is there a reason?

On Becoming Weavers of History

The largest graduating class in the 207-year history of the College gathered on the campus lawn on the morning of May 21 to receive their parchments and some sage advice from a newsman who has chronicled America's history-in-the-making for the past 50 years.

Long-time CBS correspondent Eric Sevareid, who proclaimed himself to be a "horseback philosopher," uttered one portentous word to the graduates as they looked to their future: not plastics, not biogenetics, but "History."

"You must continue to read history throughout life," Sevareid urged them. "To me it would seem impossible to have any grasp at all on where we are, let alone where we may be going, without knowing where we have been." He recalled the rebellious atmosphere of the '60s, in which the past was dismissed as irrelevant. "But a society that abolishes its past is like a person struck by amnesia," Sevareid commented. "It can only wander in circles, stumbling into the same pitfalls time after time."

Yet in a certain sense, he said, history does begin with the young, "because great leaps of the imagination are now required, far more than extra accumulations of fact." Sevareid quoted from poet Edna St. Vincent Millay: "Upon this gifted age, in its dark hour, falls from the sky a meteoric shower of facts. . . . They lie uncollected, uncombined. Wisdom enough to heal us of our woe is daily spun, but there exists no loom to weave it into a fabric."

The task of the young educated person, Sevareid said, is to "fashion his own loom as best he can, to try to weave some corner of the fabric."

Tomorrow's best weavers, he said, must have the courage to think anew—"the political leaders of my generation are philosophically worn out"—and to readmit the words "duty" and "responsibilities," "sacrifice" and "austerity" to the national lexicon.

In awarding Sevareid the honorary Doctor of Letters degree, College President Douglass Cater celebrated his lifelong contributions to print, radio and television. "First and foremost a man of letters, he has brought the power of quiet reflection to television, a medium not noted for its reflective capabilities," Cater said. "His words, both written and spoken, reveal perceptive and eloquent insight into the major happenings of our times."

Cater also presented an honorary Doctor of Letters degree to Lucille Clifton, former poet laureate of Maryland, and honorary Doctors of Arts to historic preservationists Horace Haver-meyer Jr. and his wife, Rosalind, of Chestertown.

In his remarks to the Class of 1989, President Cater asked: "Was it worth the toil and sacrifice and coin of the realm, not only for you but for parents and other patrons who helped pay the high cost of tuition?"

Today's college graduates will almost certainly earn more money—"unless you learned here that you would rather pursue scholarship or some other calling that society fails to reward justly"—and will have more leisure time than non-college graduates. More importantly, though, college graduates have acquired the skills necessary to contemplate the world's dilemmas and attempt to solve them.

"If you learned anything here, you surely have concluded that Thought—hard and humane thought—offers the brightest prospect not only for each of you but for this small college and this small planet we call earth."

WC's Prize Students Honored At Commencement

Mona G. Brinkley, who in her senior address at Washington College's 207th commencement reflected upon what her college education has given her and her fellow classmates—discipline, a sense of connection, and the realization that education is not an end product but the process of learning, was called to the podium again near the end of the ceremonies to accept the College's highest honor: the prestigious George Washington Medal and Award.

The medal, awarded annually to the senior who shows "the greatest promise of understanding and realizing in both life and work the ideals of a liberal arts education," went this year to a North Carolinian who was graduated summa cum laude with departmental honors in English. Brinkley, a leader on campus since her freshman year, has been accepted into the graduate program in English at Washington University in St. Louis, Missouri.

The College's most famous and lucrative award, the Sophie Kerr Prize, went to Michele Balzé, a multi-talented woman from Glen Burnie, Maryland, who aspires to teach literature and/or art history at the college level. A photographer and artist as well as writer, Balzé took home $26,767, which she intends to use to help defray living expenses while pursuing an interdisciplinary doctoral degree in art and English at the University of Rochester in New York. (She was awarded a full scholarship from Rochester guaranteed for three of the five years she will be studying there).

The Sophie Kerr Prize, named for the prolific writer of women's stories and Eastern Shore native who bequeathed a half million dollars to the College in 1965, is awarded each year to the senior demonstrating the best "ability and promise for future fulfillment in the field of literary endeavor." Balzé's portfolio included her English thesis on William Faulkner and the narrative method written from a feminist point of view, several poems, and some critical reviews.

Dr. Nancy Tatum, chair of the English Department, commented that the job of selecting each year's Sophie Kerr winner from an array of talent on campus is "a terrible task," yet the Sophie Kerr Committee was impressed that Balzé's work "showed unusual expertise in more than one art form."

Balzé also shared with senior Andrea E. Kehoe of Westminster, Maryland, the Clark-Porter Medal, which is given annually to the student or students whose character and personal integrity, in the opinion of the faculty, have most clearly enhanced the quality of campus life. The medal is presented by Charles B. Clark '34 in memory of Harry P. Porter '05.

Kehoe, who was graduated summa cum laude with departmental honors in English and philosophy, wrote for the College newspaper, The Elm, and in her senior year was editor of The Collegian, a monthly magazine of the campus paper. She was a regular contributor to the Washington College Magazine as well. She also received the Emil J. C. Hildenbrand Memorial Medal, given annually by the Washington, D.C. Chapter of the Alumni Association to the senior who attains the highest average in English study. She intends to begin graduate work at the Columbia University School of Journalism this fall.

Two biology majors, Joseph Gregory Bucci of Bel Air, Maryland, and Elizabeth Anne Lund of Reisterstown, Maryland, were awarded the Jane Huston Goodfellow Memorial Prize, given annually to science majors who exhibit an "abiding appreciation of the arts and humanities and have shown scholastic excellence."

Rachel Ann Smith, who was graduated cum laude with a degree in political science, was awarded the Eugene B. Casey Medal. The Casey Medal is given annually to the senior woman voted by the faculty to be "outstanding in qualities of scholarship, character, leadership, and campus citizenship."

Smith, who will begin graduate study at Washington University's School of Law in Missouri this fall, also was one of two recipients of the Gold Pentagon Award. This award is presented each year by Omicron Delta Kappa, the national leadership honor society, to one senior and one alumnus, faculty and/or friend of the College "in recognition of meritorious service to Washington College." The other Gold Pentagon Award was presented to professor and chair of the department of philosophy and religion, J. David Newell.

Matthew Lee Wilson of Dix Hills, New York, was awarded the Henry W. C. Catlin '94 Medal, given annually to the senior man voted by the faculty to be "outstanding in qualities of scholarship, character, leadership, and campus citizenship." Wilson, who was co-captain of the basketball team and a two-time first team All-American lacrosse player, was also the recipient of the Eldridge L. Eliason Award, given to the senior ranking in the upper half of his class who has contributed most in the field of athletics.

Three '89 Grads Make Their Way Into The World

by Andrea E. Kehoe '89

When Commencement ended and the caps and gowns were discarded, many graduates from the class of 1989 left Chestertown to seek jobs. Others looked past the summer, anticipating graduate or professional school in the fall.

Still others, like Kathy McGuigan, already had a head start on a career. For McGuigan, getting her first job in radio was as easy as picking up the phone. Last summer, while working in Washington College's Development Office, she asked for a job at WCTR, a Chestertown AM radio station.

The station took her on, and she spent the summer writing and producing commercials and working as an afternoon dee-jay while continuing her job at the College. When classes started up in the fall, she stayed on as a weekend dee-jay.

In February, her course requirements for graduation completed, McGuigan moved on to a full-time position at WCMD, a larger AM station in LaPlata, Maryland. She recently left that job, seeking to break into FM radio. The start she got at WCTR has convinced her to continue her career in broadcast journalism. "I adored it. I absolutely adored it," she says. "It was the best experience anybody could have asked for."

Though it is still early in her radio career, McGuigan had the chance to do everything from reading agricultural updates to interviewing Maryland Governor William Donald Schaefer.

"It takes a while to get everything down," she says. "But it's great when people say, 'That was a good show the other day.' That's the best reward, when people enjoy the show."

Now McGuigan hopes to test her skills in a larger FM market, where bigger audiences mean more advertising dollars and higher salaries — but also a fiercer level of competition.

Eventually she would like to parlay her radio experience to get into television, or use her background as an international studies major as a foreign correspondent.

"To be involved with interesting people, the people making news, would be great. To be able to cover that would be such an exciting thing," she says.

Much of her liberal arts education has been put to use already, McGuigan points out.

"It's funny how often you run across something you learned in college," she says. "You find you studied this thing in architecture, this in international law, this in Shakespeare with Dr. Tatum."

The myth of the absentminded professor, buried in books and distant from daily life, is one John Buettner will try to dispel as he begins his graduate work in philosophy at Pennsylvania's Villanova University, which awarded him a full scholarship and an annual stipend. Though he will gladly learn and gladly teach, he also plans to patronize "all the neat places where people hang out in Philly."

"I'm looking forward to exploring the city," says Buettner, who spent the summer as a sales clerk at Baltimore-Washington International Airport's duty-free shop.

The philosophy major credits Washington College with developing his writing skills and giving him the background to perform in the academic world.

"I don't want to be one of those professors who settles into the couch with some potato chips and watches 'ALF' without feeling guilty," says Buettner, who eventually plans to earn a doctorate in philosophy.

Such courses as Dr. Robert Anderson's senior seminar in metaphysics and a liberation theology course team taught by Dr. Kevin Brien and Dr. Peter Tapke provided a solid body of knowledge that students at other colleges often miss, he explains.

"Washington College doesn't know how much of a treasure that department is," he argues.

Ironically, Buettner came to the College intending to major in English, but found himself lured by the lively philosophical debates he encountered in Dr. Anderson's honors course on "The Foundations of Morality."

Radio days: Kathy McGuigan got a start on her career in broadcasting at Chestertown's local AM station, WCTR.

"[Philosophy] seemed to come naturally to me," he recalls. "I liked reading it and I liked discussing it. For me it's like drinking water; it's something I'm comfortable with."

This fall Buettner will take seminars on St. Thomas Aquinas, Immanuel Kant and Edmund Husserl, in addition to working 20 hours a week for Villanova's philosophy department. He looks forward to getting into the classroom as a teaching assistant during his second year of study.

"I hope to use teaching as a soapbox to heighten people's awareness of their role in the world," he says. "It may be idealistic, but in a democracy we are the makers of our future."

Buettner says his own political and social consciousness has been shaped by an interdisciplinary course on "Individualism and Commitment in America" taught by J. David Newell, philosophy department chairman, and Lucille Sansing, assistant dean of the College and sociology professor. Another source of influence has been the "sincere and active humanists" he found among the student body.

"I didn't come into college as an activist, but I left interested in that," he says. "It shows that Washington College wasn't just a rich kids' school, a four-year babysitter. A lot of people there were involved in doing something in life to work for others."

All Molly McMahon knew, as she picked up her diploma at Commencement, was that she was going to New York City to work "somewhere — anywhere." Months later, she's still savoring a tasty bite of the Big Apple. She now has an apartment in a "nice neighborhood" in Brooklyn and a job as an assistant to the director of development at the Museum of Modern Art (MOMA).

"Last spring my plans changed on a weekly basis," remembers McMahon, adding that Dr. Linda Cades of the Career Development Office deserves credit for providing the encouragement she needed to make the move.

"I would come in every week with a new idea on how to get to New York. Instead of looking at me and laughing, she'd pull out a book and come up with places to write to," she says.

After plans to pursue a master's degree in art history and studio art fell by the wayside, McMahon decided to pack her bags and find a job in Manhattan. Housing was soon arranged — she shares her Brooklyn apartment with Chas. Foster and Cathy Jewell, also 1989 WC grads, and Jeremiah Foster, who studied art at the College until December 1988. Jewell, a former English and history major, works for a legal publishing firm, while Chas. Foster, an art major, recently ended a stint as a bicycle courier and is seeking more stationary employment.

"There are so many possibilities here," McMahon says. "Anything's possible in New York."

Her belief in the Big Apple is supported by her good fortune there. She landed her job, the first and only for which she interviewed, after a one-day search.

"After the interview, I was depressed because I was sure I wouldn't get it," she recalls. "My housemates are all artists, so they thought it sounded great, but nobody really thought I would get it."

Her diverse background in the humanities gave her an edge on the competition, McMahon guesses, since MOMA sponsors concerts and a film series in addition to housing its art collection. The French major spent her junior year abroad at the University of Strasbourg in France, where she included German classes in her curriculum. She took piano lessons at WC, enhancing the music background that started with flute in high school, and gave the stage a try in productions of Shakespeare's Henry IV, Part 1, and Ionesco's Exit the King. Courses in art and film rounded out her résumé.

McMahon's duties include secretarial tasks and designing a newsletter to mail to MOMA's trustees and members. Even sending out catalogs can be fun, she explains, when one of the envelopes is addressed to actress Lillian Gish.

"I kept thinking, 'Wow, she's going to get this....'" McMahon says.

In addition to a salary that's "plenty to start off with" and a promise of a raise in November, the job's fringe benefits include free passes to the city's other art museums, discounts in art supply shops, and invitations to MOMA's celebrity-studded exhibit openings.

"There's all this great art here, and I'm with it every day," she says.

Although art has been an interest of McMahon's since she won a contest in elementary school, her passion for the field was sparked in Tex Andrews' visual design class in her senior year.

"It wasn't just sitting down, writing papers, reading books, writing more papers, reading more books. You could show your thoughts in a different way. You could create something," she says.

She found herself working on design projects late into the night, believing only an hour had passed as dawn crept through her window. In the spring she audited Andrews' art criticism course.

"He's a good teacher," she says. "He's really interested in what he teaches. He's interested, so he gets other people interested as well."

Now that she's broken into the world of art museums, McMahon is considering continuing her art education to ready herself for a shift to another MOMA department, when a position opens up.

"I plan to bask in this for a while, though," she says. "Sometimes it just hits me that I live in New York and I work at MOMA. Like the other day — here I was, walking down Fifth Avenue to hand-deliver a letter to David Rockefeller."

Andrea Kehoe is also a 1989 graduate heading off for the Big Apple. She will enroll at Columbia University School of Journalism this fall. She is a frequent contributor to the Washington College Magazine.

1989-90 Tuition Increases

The Board of Visitors and Governors of Washington College approved a 9.4 percent tuition increase and a 10 percent room-and-board hike for the 1989-90 academic year, raising costs for undergraduates to $14,900.

Tuition has been raised from $9,600 to $10,500. Room-and-board charges were raised from $4,000 to $4,400.

The College's increases are in line with other private schools in Maryland. Total costs at Hood College this year are $15,000; St. John's costs are $14,700; Johns Hopkins University students will pay a total of $16,830.

College President Douglass Cater said faculty and staff salary increases, the rising costs of health insurance and retirement programs, and increased costs for food and utilities necessitated the increase. The College is also incurring additional unforeseen costs to implement government regulations concerning the removal of hazardous material and the replacement of PCB transformers.

Nevertheless, says Cater, students and parents continue to pay only two-thirds of the College's operating costs. The remaining third of the operating budget is met by federal and state grants, endowment income, and voluntary gifts from alumni, parents and friends of the College. Funds for major capital programs are raised independently and are not derived from tuition or room-and-board fees.

Bonnie Vansant, director of financial aid, says approximately 42 percent of the student body will receive tuition assistance this year.

Two Named Trustees

A Baltimore lawyer and a Philadelphia financier have joined the College's Board of Visitors and Governors.

John A. Moag, Jr. '77 is a partner in the law firm Patton, Boggs & Blow. He earned a law degree from the University of Baltimore in 1981, and has held various political and governmental positions in Maryland, working closely with members of U.S. Congress and the leadership of the House of Representatives. Active in politics and the American and Maryland Bar associations, he frequently lectures and writes on the legislative process.

He is a member of the Governor's Special Advisory Committee on Professional Sports and the Governor's Maryland Air and Space Museum Council.

Thomas J. Maher is president of the mortgage banking firm Thomas J. Maher & Company, Inc. in Philadelphia. He is also director and founder of Commerce Bank of Pennsylvania, N.A. in Center City. A 1963 graduate of the Wharton School of Business, he attended graduate school at the University of Michigan.

A charter member of the College's 1782 Society, Maher established the Thomas J. and Belle Patterson Maher Scholarship at Washington College and donated money for the purchase of a crew shell christened the Belle Patterson in 1983. Both his son, Thompson '83, and his daughter, Jenna '85, graduated from Washington College.

Campus Renovation Unearths Original Building

When workers recently removed asphalt from the fire lane in front of Hodson Hall, making way for the new pedestrian walkway, they uncovered more than mud and clay. They unearthed a bit of history as well.

Robert Janson-La Palme, art professor and unofficial college historian, says "there's no doubt" that the masonry wall excavated is part of the original college building which was completed in 1788 and destroyed by fire in 1827.

During renovations around Middle Hall in 1981, several points outlining the original building were discovered, but the building site could not be fully determined because workers couldn't get under the College lane. The recently unearthed masonry wall ties in to the points uncovered earlier, he says.

The new pedestrian walk, a bricked path stretching from Gibson Fine Arts Center to the intersection of Washington Avenue, is expected to be completed this fall.

College Community Welcomes New Faculty

Several new professors have joined the Washington College faculty this fall.

MaryAnne Baenninger has been appointed assistant professor of psychology. With a doctoral degree from Temple University in developmental psychology, her areas of interest include research in gender differences. Her teaching areas include developmental and social psychology.

Dale Daigle has been appointed assistant professor of drama. He holds a master's of fine arts in drama and theatre from the University of Hawaii at Manoa. He has experience in directing, producing, lecturing, and lighting design.

Satinder Sidhu has been appointed assistant professor of physics. He received his doctoral degree from Penn State University. His research areas include condensed matter theory and accelerator theory and design.

In a special faculty appointment, Theodore Kurze '43 has been named a senior fellow in philosophy and psychology. A distinguished neurosurgeon, Dr. Kurze has published widely on medicine and philosophy. He was formerly a clinical professor at the University of Southern California and director of brain services for the Health Insurance Plan of New York.

Robert and Shireen Hunter are joint recipients of the Louis L. Goldstein Chair in Public Policy. Both professors from Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies, they will each teach one course in political science at Washington College this fall. Robert Hunter is Director of European Studies at Georgetown's Center. He will be teaching a course entitled "Making U.S. Foreign Policy." Shireen Hunter, Iranian by birth, is Deputy Director of the Middle East Project at Georgetown's Center. Her course is entitled "Introduction to the History of Politics of the Middle East."

Ellen Klein has been appointed visiting professor of philosophy to fill in for J. David Newell, who is on sabbatical this year. Klein received her doctoral degree from the University of Miami. Her research and teaching areas include epistemology, logic, feminist theory and philosophy of science.

Sylvia Lahvis has been named visiting assistant professor of art, replacing Robert Janson-La Palme who is on sabbatical this fall. Lahvis holds a doctoral degree in art history from the University of Delaware. Her research areas include American sculpture, New England architecture and Art Nouveau.

Bonnie Melinda Sachs has been named visiting assistant professor of German. She earned her doctoral degree from Princeton University.

John Stewart has been named visiting associate professor of psychology. He received his Ph.D. at Bowling Green State University. His teaching interests include experimental psychology, social development, environmental and comparative psychology. He previously served as Chief of Research and Evaluation at the Regional Institute for Children and Adolescents in Rockville.

Suzanne Cartier James has been named a lecturer in French. She earned her master's degree from Villanova University.

Summer Programs Take Teachers Beyond Textbooks

Hundreds of thousands of high school students encounter frustration, disillusionment, and academic failure each year—many graduate without knowing how to read and write. Why?

Private and public educators nationally have probed the ideas and values that underlie education in America. The answer was clear: our teachers must go beyond lectures and textbooks. They need distinctive skills and sensitivity to help young people understand the tradition, diversity and accomplishments of our civilization.

Each summer Washington College forms a partnership with teachers from Maryland public schools to address the educational needs of our nation's high school students in two innovative programs.

Entitled "Education, Democracy and The Modern World," the Washington College High School Faculty Seminar helps Maryland secondary school teachers relate their professional lives and teaching to the broad issues of citizenship in America. Modeled on the Executive Seminar Series of the Aspen Institute and the Wye Faculty Seminar, the program brings together Maryland teachers from various disciplines and school districts for intellectually rigorous dialogue.

Moderated by Washington College humanities faculty and joined by distinguished resource guests, discussions revolve around themes central to the American democratic experience: volunteerism, individual rights versus public responsibilities, and education with a public purpose.

Readings include political, philosophical and creative literature, ranging from Plato's discussion of the ideal society, to selections from Jefferson, John Stuart Mill, Adam Smith, and Alan Bloom's highly critical The Closing of the American Mind.

Dr. J. David Newell, chair of the philosophy department and one of this year's moderators, explains: "The high school teachers really appreciate the flexibility of this program because their normal schedules are so structured that they rarely have time to engage in free-thinking about American heritage, culture, and values. Through personal and public reflections, they develop different perspectives on teaching in today's society."

Approximately 30 teachers representing the humanities, social sciences, natural sciences, business and vocational studies participated in the program this past summer.

A second summer program at the College is the Maryland Writing Project. It is a workshop to help teachers improve student writing, says Dr.

Richard L. Gillin, professor of English and coordinator of the Eastern Shore site of the Project.

Sessions are led by Maryland's best classroom teachers, carefully selected for their skills at teaching writing, and for their ability to work with other teachers. The goal of the project is to train teachers to help students write with vividness, detail and precision, and how to integrate writing with science, business and other disciplines.

"A program of this caliber has certainly raised the profile of the College, the teaching community, and the Eastern Shore," says Dr. Gillin. "I find it personally gratifying to work with teachers who have such a strong professional sense of commitment to teaching and writing."

On The Tennis Court They're All-Americans

Call it the domino theory. Or simply a friendly game of tennis. Some members of Washington College's successful men's tennis team have been spreading the news back home in their foreign lands about the game at this small liberal arts school in the States, and encouraging their friends to come.

Their encouragement has paid off for Washington College's women's program. Two of last year's recruits, Monica Blanco, a 21-year-old from Mexico City, and Tracy Peel, an 18-year-old from Johannesburg, South Africa, swept into the Division III tennis circuit and finished among the top eight doubles pairings in the country. The tandem was ranked seventh after national competition in Claremont, California, in May, and Peel finished with a national ranking of 14th in singles.

Their outstanding finishes earned them the distinction of becoming Washington College's first All-American women's tennis players.

At the nationals, Blanco and Peel dropped their first match to the second-seeded team from the University of California, San Diego, who went on to win the championship. In singles competition, Peel defeated Emory University's player in two sets before losing to a three-time nationals competitor from St. Benedict's.

"I thought they competed very well at the nationals," says Head Coach Holly Bramble. "To even get there is something."

During regular season play, Blanco and Peel racked up a 14-2 doubles record, losing only to Division I George Mason University and Murray State. Peel lost her first two singles matches before settling in to defeat her next 15 opponents. Peel and Meg Wheatley took second place in doubles at the women's first-ever Middle Atlantic Conference championships. The team finished the season 12-7 overall.

Peel learned about Washington College from All-American tennis players Larry Gewer and Peter Maller, who play at the same club in Johannesburg. The "Mexican Connection," Washington's All-Americans Enrique Leal, Alejandro Hernandez and Claudio Gonzales, helped bring Blanco to Washington College.

The men's team finished fourth in their fourth consecutive NCAA Division III Tennis Championships. Three players, Gewer (ranked second), Maller, and Scott Read, also earned All-American honors. Maller was honored, too, as an Academic All-American, maintaining a 3.6 grade point average through his junior year.

Sho'men Club Gains Momentum

Coaches at Washington College have long yearned for the extra money needed for special equipment, uniforms, or travel, only to have their hopes dashed when budget time rolled around. Now, through the generosity of the Sho'men Club, some of the items they've only dreamed about are being realized.

The Sho'men Club, organized last year for the promotion and encouragement of intercollegiate athletics, has consolidated various athletic fund-raising groups under one umbrella to provide extra budgetary support for the entire athletic program, and this year may pull the Hall of Fame Committee under its wing. The men's lacrosse boosters, the Stick Supporters, remains a separate entity, however.

In its inaugural year, the Sho'men Club raised $23,000 for Washington College athletics. Of that amount, $6,600 was in unrestricted funds. After asking the coaches to come up with a "wish list," the Sho'men Club Board authorized the purchase of bleachers for the women's athletic field and an outdoor video camera package, and pumped additional money into the College's reawakening recreational sports program.

"This organization has heightened sensitivity to women's needs," comments Athletic Director Geoffrey M. Miller, "and the Board has agreed that unrestricted money should support the women's program." Of each restricted gift, 80% goes to help support one particular sport and 20% is channeled into a general sports fund.

Memberships in the Sho'men Club range from sponsors ($25-$99), Maroon & Black Club ($100-$249), Griffin Club ($250-$499), Coaches Club ($500-$999), to the Flying Pentagon Club ($1000+), with corresponding benefits. All members receive sports schedules and newsletters, a decal and a membership card. Flying Pentagon members are entitled to four complimentary season passes, a shirt and a lapel pin. The Sho'men Club also sponsors receptions for athletes, parents, friends and alumni after selected sporting events.

"The Sho'men Club has a lot of potential," says Miller. "We'd like to get more people involved this coming year." Miller and Club President Fred Schroeter see it as the opportunity to raise the level of sports overall.

Persons interested in joining the Sho'men Club should contact Geoffrey M. Miller, Athletic Director, Washington College, Chestertown, MD 21620, or phone (301) 778-2800.

Novel By Sophie Kerr Winner Earns Accolades

Peter Turchi, the 1982 recipient of Washington College's famed Sophie Kerr Prize, has dispelled the "Sophie Curse," a bit of campus folklore which has it that a Sophie Kerr winner will never publish.

That myth was first broken by William L. Thompson '70, a reporter for Baltimore's Evening Sun, when his book of nonfiction about the Chesapeake Bay, Bayside Impressions, was published in 1984.

Turchi is the first Sophie Kerr winner, however, to publish a novel. He will return to Washington College in early October to read excerpts from his new book.

The first draft of his novel, The Girls Next Door, was completed during his undergraduate days and was submitted as part of his Sophie Kerr portfolio. Turchi worked on the novel for five years before he felt it was ready for publication. New American Library, publishers of popular fiction by authors such as Stephen King and Ken Follett, purchased the manuscript for publication in the spring of 1988.

With its release this summer, Turchi's first novel has been praised as "a very warm and perceptive story about a young husband's coming of age, set in the summer of 1963, just before John F. Kennedy's death shattered the American dream.... Mr. Turchi has produced a stunning first novel — entertaining, uplifting and wonderfully wise," said Susanne Trowbridge in a book review for the Baltimore Sun.

The book is set in Turchi's hometown Baltimore. (He now lives in Chicago, and will be a lecturer in fiction writing this fall at Northwestern University.) His hero, George Willus, gets some new neighbors—three young girls and an older woman—who work in the world's oldest profession.

The prostitutes' arrival raises doubts in the mind of the newlywed George who is living with his wife, Donna, in the house he grew up in—doubts that he has missed opportunities for travel and adventure. The book deals with how he resolves his temptation by the girls next door, and what he learns about himself and his neighborhood.

Turchi has created some memorable characters as well. George Willus's father named his seven sons and one daughter after the starting lineup of the 1927 Yankees, which he considers to be the best baseball team in history. George was named after the most heroic Yankee, Babe Ruth, whose real name was George Henderson.

George's father, who traveled extensively before settling down in Baltimore and whose favorite book is the Odyssey, quotes Homer to his children when they gather after their mother's death.

In an interview with the Baltimore Sun recently, Turchi said his first novel was influenced by master storytellers Mark Twain and F. Scott Fitzgerald, as well as the Odyssey. He's been reading Chekhov seriously, and writers he admires include Toni Morrison and Italo Calvino, Vladimir Nabokov and Milan Kundera, Jorge Luis Borges and Gabriel Garcia Marquez. Turchi was in Baltimore in early August to promote his new book in area bookstores and on local talk shows.

He is now in the middle of writing his second novel.

Development Office Announces Promotion

The Development Office has promoted Bridget McElroy '87 to Assistant Director of Development.

McElroy began working for the College's development office as secretary to Vice President for Development and College Relations F. David Wheelan '78 in November 1988. Within three months she was promoted to development assistant.

As assistant director, McElroy shares responsibility for the Washington College Fund with associate director Bob Polk. McElroy is responsible for the office's telethon efforts, the Community Campaign, the senior class giving effort, and shares responsibility for class agents' appeals. The Washington College Fund raised approximately $1.1 million in the last fiscal year.

"Having received a Washington College education, it's easy for me to ask people to support it," says McElroy. A large part of my job is calling alumni on the phone. I enjoy talking with them and sharing various experiences—they believe in the College so much. It's very rare to talk with someone who had a negative experience here."

McElroy, who attended a large high school before coming to Washington College as a student, values most the opportunity she had to have contact with faculty outside the classroom. "I learned to appreciate, too, how in a liberal arts education everything ties together," she says. "Something you learned from English class can be applied to philosophy, or history. It's important to be well-rounded."

Linda Hamilton '78 Comes Home to Washington College

by Marshall Williams

The star of "Beauty and the Beast" sat on a couch in Brown Cottage, the Washington College guest house, watching television as the 1989 Preakness began. She whispered words of encouragement for Sunday Silence, which she was backing in a friendly bet with her husband.

Linda Hamilton '78 was making her first visit back to Washington College, to see old friends and to receive an Alumni Citation at the College's 207th Commencement exercises. Another Commencement guest, poet Lucille Clifton, sat next to the actress. Like Hamilton, Clifton was a visitor from California with roots in Maryland. Watching the Preakness, a look of happiness spread over Clifton's face as she said "Isn't it wonderful how quickly you can get back to it all?"

Linda Hamilton's return to Washington College gave her the same feeling of happiness and homecoming. She met up with friends from her college years, toured the College, and visited a house on Campus Avenue she lived in during her sophomore year.

While Hamilton declined the many inquiries from the Baltimore press, she did agree to sit down for an interview with the Washington College Magazine. She seemed eager to reminisce about her days in Chestertown, and to discuss the fame — and attendant problems — she has attained in Hollywood.

Linda Hamilton came to Washington College in September 1974 and completed two years before moving to New York to pursue an acting career full-time. She had done some theatre work in high school in Salisbury, Maryland, working as a teacher's assistant through one production, and acting and directing in children's theater. She enrolled in two acting classes at Washington College, and performed in a couple of student productions, "Prometheus Bound" by John Milton (Tex Andrews '79, now Assistant Professor of Art at the College, played Prometheus), and Elmer Rice's "The Adding Machine."

But she says her love for theater really grew when she became involved with the Kent Players, a community theater group that performed in what is now the Chester Movie Theater. She was in several productions, including a theatrical version of Henry Fielding's picaresque novel Tom Jones, Agatha Christie's perennial favorite "The Mousetrap," and a musical adaptation of Oscar Wilde's The Importance of Being Ernest called "Ernest in Love." "I was Cecily," says Hamilton. "That was the first and only time I've ever sung in a role!"

Leslie Prince Raimond '63, who is still active in community theater in Chestertown, remembers when Hamilton auditioned for "Tom Jones." "She sounded so fabulous — you really sat up and took notice," says Raimond. "We were all very impressed, and I knew she would have a leading role." Raimond remembers that Hamilton chose to play the part of Miss Western, the older woman in hot pursuit of Tom Jones. "There was great comedy in Miss Western," remembers Hamilton. "I had to work on an English accent. It was a big production, Linda Hamilton has become a much sought-after film and television actress. Fellow alums found her warm and funny. A publicity still reveals her dramatic side.

and everybody was a lot of fun."

Hamilton's inclination toward community theater rather than college productions indicates that she was already thinking about life beyond college. Others agree. English Professor Bennett Lamond, who often had lunch with Hamilton, remembers that she was very attractive and mature for her age. "She was more of a young woman than most students," he says, and he recalls that in her second year she moved off campus and once she was involved in community theater, didn't associate much with college life.

"She was a real hot babe," agrees Tex Andrews, "and she had trouble dealing with the other drama students—or they had trouble dealing with her." Andrews remembers that she quickly broke from the core group of drama students, and found more satisfying work with the Kent Players.

What Hamilton says about her college years is that she grew up fast, matured a great deal and discovered what it was she wanted to do in life. "I lost a lot of weight," she says, "and when I got here I could just feel a lot of relief. I remember feeling very free, and I actually ran across the college lawn barefoot, thinking I had come alive."

Hamilton's favorite and most memorable course at Washington College was a political science class with Professor John Taylor. "That was another eye-opener for me. It got me to think hard and to read, to study, and I realized that there was a world out there that I should learn about and be involved with." (Hamilton was thrilled to watch as Professor Taylor received the Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching during the Commencement Ceremonies, and was delighted to meet his young son, Russell, a great "Beauty and the Beast" fan.)

Having decided that theater was her overriding passion, Hamilton moved to New York with boyfriend Tom Wright, an actor from Centreville who had also been in a number of Kent Players productions. They lived in a Lower East Side apartment that was broken into four times in just a few years. Hamilton studied Method acting at the Lee Strasberg Theater Institute, worked in off-off-Broadway productions and made her professional debut in the daytime soap opera, "Search for Tomorrow."

With encouragement from her agent, she decided to take the next enormous step and move to Hollywood. As she told a Washington Post reporter, "It was frightening...I had little to show for four years in New York. I was still an ingenue." Down and out in Los Angeles with eight dollars left to her name, she landed a guest starring role on "Shirley," the Shirley Jones show. From there she went on to play "The Queen of Suffering," as she describes herself in many of her roles, in such films as "King Kong Lives," "Black Moon Rising," "Children of the Corn" and "T.A.G.—The Assassination Game."

Her breakthrough came with yet another chase vehicle—"The Terminator," with Arnold Schwarzenegger. As "the Mother of the Future," Hamilton played in a subplot with Michael Biehn that, despite the film's violence, rings with an anti-war message and a bleak but hopeful vision of the world following a nuclear holocaust. "I really wasn't interested when I read the script," says Hamilton, "and I was even less interested when they told me Arnold Schwarzenegger would be in it (originally, Schwarzenegger was cast in the Michael Biehn role of hero, not villain). But I read my part and saw that it had a romantic aspect that was very important. It was really the love story of the century."

Hamilton remembers putting in a lot of extra work with co-star Biehn, re-writing dialogue and making some poorly written scenes interesting. "We realized we could be doing something good, and we made as much out of the material as possible. That was a good experience for me."

Work that she has enjoyed since "The Terminator" includes the role of Sandy, Joe Coffey's girlfriend in the acclaimed series "Hill Street Blues," and the television movie "Go Toward the Light," in which she played the mother of a young, hemophiliac boy dying of AIDS. That movie won special praise from critics for being quietly insightful and unusually well-crafted.

In 1986 Hamilton contracted to work on a new television series pilot with the improbable premise that a society of outcasts lived in the subway and utility tunnels underneath New York City. One of the outcasts, Vincent, is half man and half lion, at times tender, at other times violent. Hamilton was to play an assistant district attorney who falls in love with him. "Beauty and the Beast" immediately won critical praise for its lavish production values, consistently strong ethics and romantic, literate writing. While it never attracted the large number of viewers of a "Dallas" or "Murder, She Wrote," the show developed a devoted following, and has run now for two seasons.

The day before she arrived on campus, CBS announced that "Beauty and the Beast" would not be on the fall schedule. CBS Entertainment President Kim LeMasters said at a news conference that "We have not abandoned this show.... It needs a little bit of work, and we want to tend to it, because we consider it a precious commodity to our schedule." CBS, he said, had ordered 12 new episodes and would use "Beauty and the Beast" as a replacement show later in the season.

Hamilton agrees that the show needs work, and would like to see a change from the "Catherine gets in trouble, Vincent rescues her, they embrace" routine of this season's programs. She hopes the show's writers will explore the darker side of Vincent's beastliness and put more complexity into the leading characters' emotions. "They (network executives) don't like conflict," she said, "but conflict is what the program is about. It's in the title and it's what makes our relationship unique. I should be allowed to see the beast in Vincent, and make that part of my attraction for him."

Hamilton may back out of the program if these developments aren't pursued. She does have an escape clause in her five-year contract. If she isn't offered at least 22 shows in a season, she can leave, and she may be ready to do just that. "It's a grueling show to produce. We work terrible hours, and they are always drenching me with a fire hose or blowing in toxic smoke from smoke machines for effect."

Despite CBS's claims of support, Hamilton isn't convinced that the network is committed to "Beauty and the Beast." Going into its third season, the show needs one more full year's worth of programs to be eligible for syndication. Syndication is the magic word in television, and usually means that a program like "Beauty and the Beast" would make money for the network for the first time. If CBS is planning only twelve additional segments, Hamilton thinks the show is finished in the eyes of the producers.

Hamilton seems to be ready to leave "Beauty and the Beast," and perhaps her career momentarily. She's due to have a baby in the fall, and it's the beginning of a family that she and her husband, actor Bruce Abbott, have been planning for several years. They recently moved from a small house in Marina del Rey to a more comfortable one in Pacific Palisades, home of a growing number of young families. It would be a natural time for her to leave the series and take a few years to raise a family.

Linda Hamilton at Commencement, with Dean Ferris '67, a vice president at 20th Century Fox, and First Lady Libby Cater.

She's also dying to get back on the stage. "I miss the theatre," she says, "and although there's not a lot of opportunity to do theatre in Los Angeles, I would love the chance." Theatre in LA is growing, and there are several repertory companies presenting important work. "Also," she says enthusiastically, "I would really love to do some comedy." Whether it was in the theatre or a really good character part in a film, Hamilton would jump at the chance to break away from the emotionally wrought performances that have been her trademark.

Asked who are some of her favorite fellow actors, Hamilton quickly mentions Michael Biehn, her co-star in "Terminator," as being especially helpful and exciting to work with. She also names Piper Laurie, with whom she worked in "Go Toward the Light;" "Accidental Tourist" star Geena Davis, with whom Hamilton worked in "Secret Weapons," a television movie about a Russian plot to use seductive women to subvert Americans in Moscow; and Ron Perlman, Hamilton's costar in "Beauty and the Beast." "Perl," as she refers to her co-star, "has been terrific to work with as we developed the story of our romance. His only problem," she laughs, "is that he's sort of a quiet person, and sometimes he forgets what he looks like in the makeup he wears, and acts too low-key."

Another favorite actor is her husband, who played a psychopathic killer chasing Hamilton through "T.A.G.—The Assassination Game." They fell in love and were married in 1982. His star is also rising; Abbott recently appeared as an industrial spy in the highly praised TV movie "Trapped."

How did Linda Hamilton get stereotyped in the "Queen of Suffering," chase-me roles? "I'm comfortable with emotions on film," she says. "I can be very emotional, I like playing those scenes, and I know how to go with my instincts. My training in Method acting helped, but I've had to go beyond that. I think Method acting is really very limited—it works sometimes, and it helps with a role, but that's not all there is to it." She gets frustrated that in "Beauty and the Beast" some of my most powerful work ends up on the cutting-room floor—attribution, she says, to the producers' wanting to tread a safer and more cautious line.

The fame attendant on the success of "Terminator" and "Beauty and the Beast" has also brought some discomfort. Hamilton's followers are particularly devoted, and include a number of the crazier type of fan who like to keep a close eye on the star. When news of her pregnancy was announced in a tabloid paper, thousands of people began sending cards, letters and baby gifts, which has made Hamilton very uncomfortable. "I don't know what to do with it all," she says, "I wish people would respect my privacy more."

Another privacy problem for Hamilton is playing sex scenes in her films. "I'm really a shy person, and my husband and I are both very private. When either of us has to play an intimate scene, it's very embarrassing." It is also anything but intimate, she says, since actors generally spend several days working on such a scene, with scores of technicians, assistants and extras standing around.

Hamilton acknowledges that intimacy can play an important role in a film. "In 'Terminator,' it was a pivotal scene in which we were creating the future hero of the world. It felt right, meaningful, and that made the scene easy to do. But later I was working on "Black Moon Rising" and my very first scene, I was straddling Tommy Lee Jones in a G-string. That was pretty hard. He was even more embarrassed than I was, and wouldn't even take off his pants."

Generally, Hamilton seems comfortable with her very public life. During and after Commencement, she greeted fans from the College and community, including some who had come from as far as Baltimore to see her receive her Alumni Citation. She signed Commencement programs, T-shirts, photographs and even a lacrosse ball for "Beauty and the Beast" fans, and was never fazed by the crowds who flocked around her.

She was also happy to be reacquainted with the many old friends who came back to see her, and to be reintroduced to Washington College. She seemed almost surprised at her reaction to being back on campus, as if she were just realizing how important her college years were to her. "I'm truly thrilled to be here," she said as she accepted her Alumni Citation. "My memories of Washington College, and my time here, are very dear to me, very special still. As so many people have said to me, there was a great deal of magic then, and there is now."

Changing Tides: The Rise And Fall Of The Chester River

by Jim Landskroener M'90

Photography by J. Tyler Campbell '76

It's not hard these days to still find a quiet spot on the water, maybe some steamy little cove or inlet, and listen to the river's rich voice: the faint whisper of shore grasses, the cry of a heron, the plop of a fish, the hum of a mosquito. There are hundreds of places like this nestled serenely throughout the river's tidal area.

There is also a common visual theme: shallow water surrounded by thick, lumpy tufts of marsh grass, broken occasionally by tiny feeder streams too small to merit a name, all bordered by tall pines.

There is generally a hint of man's presence as well: the slowly rotting hull of an old boat, the brittle relic of a hunting blind, a lonely, tilted piling whose purpose has long been forgotten. Yet these quiet reminders of "us" seem no more out of place than the trunk of a fallen tree.

But look closely, there is always evidence of another, much less kind intrusion here: a styro-foam cup, a shiny patch of oil drifting by, a crumpled beer can. And there are other intrusions not easily noticed because the brown, murky water that was once clear now hides changes just beneath the surface. Gone are the submerged grasses once held by a sandy bottom. Gone are the tiny fish and soft crabs which needed this grass as a haven. Gone is much of the oxygen from the water itself.

The reality of the Chester has become one of balance that has nothing to do with nature. People and "progress" have polluted the once-pristine river. Whether this is "fair" is irrelevant, because people aren't going to leave just to be kind to a river. The real question is whether we can learn to live with and respect the river, to, as a wise person once said, "leave a place in better shape than we found it." This is a story of a few people in Kent County who have decided to take on this most difficult task.

A few years ago, Don Munson, chairman of the biology department at Washington College, completed a study of acid rain pollution at three locations in the Chester River watershed. His study focused on ways in which certain kinds of precipitation delivered the acidic rain. Thunderstorms could clean the skies and raise acidity quickly. These rains could be as strong as vinegar, and in some places the acid helped dissolve aluminum and other metals in the soil, spilling metals into the river and harming young striped bass.

This summer, he is working on a new study, charting the presence of coliform and other bacteria in the bottom sediments throughout the river system.

Munson speaks with two voices, the concerned Kent Countian and the dedicated scientist. The Kent Countian, speaking with visceral passion about the condition of the river, wonders, "Is it really as bad as we think?"

The scientist wants answers, but needs data to back up his concern for the watershed.

He points out three major problems

*T*oday my romantic vision is all but gone... The workboat and trotline compete with roaring speedboats and stodgy cabin-cruisers whose wakes nibble incessantly at the fallen shoreline. The water is too dark to look for crabs, and the river's once bountiful oyster beds are silted over.

The "Edna J.," in the peace of the early morning mist, conjures up the beauty and serenity of the Chester. Quiet coves such as this may be good for the human soul, but the creatures and plants beneath the surface are languishing.

which should be the focus of river study: waste-water treatment, non-point pollution, and population growth.

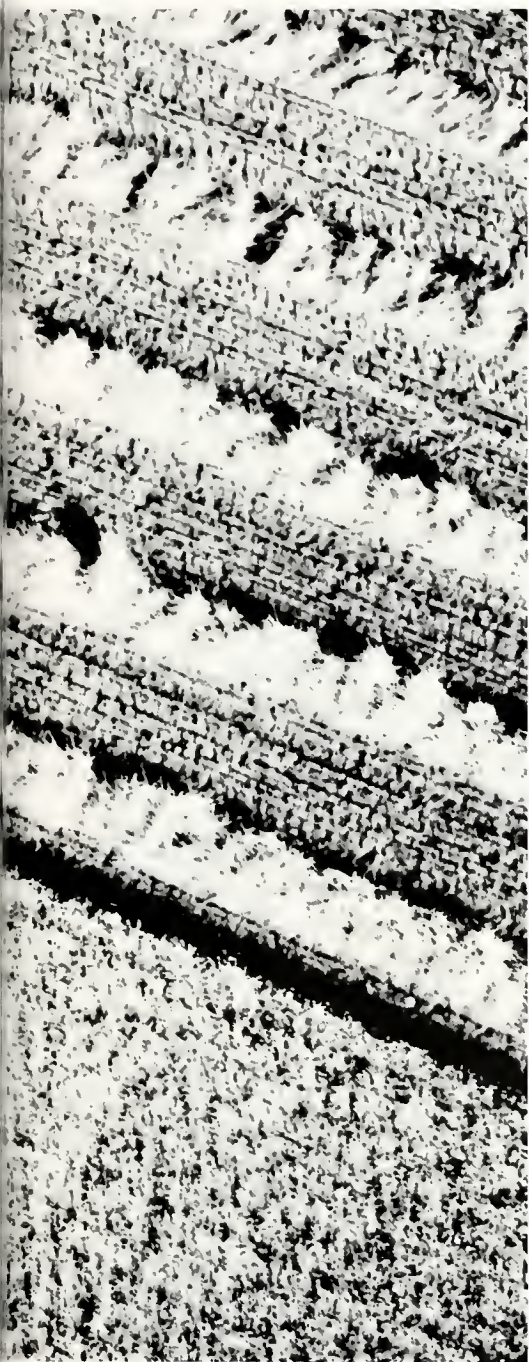

Millions of gallons of treated waste-water are delivered into the system each week by Chestertown, Queenstown, and Rock Hall. This water is rich in nutrients, principally nitrogen and phosphorous. Once in the river, microscopic plants grow and multiply in exaggerated proportions. As they die, bacteria feed on the remains. Bacteria, like all animals, need oxygen. As the oxygen is steadily removed from the water, fish cannot survive in the depleted environment.

"There is little doubt at this point," reports Munson, "that oxygen depletion of the Bay and its tributaries has had serious consequences on the native fish species. But the problem is how to get the nutrients out of the effluent from the treatment plants. It's difficult yes, but with the proper technology, it can be done. The problem, of course, is that the technology is very expensive. Who is going to pay for it? So you see, what you're really talking about is a political problem.

"Then you also have non-point pollution, the nutrients, silt and other pollutants from farms and towns which wash into the river every time it rains. And then there is the problem of growth. People naturally want to move here for obvious reasons, but that again puts more strain on the systems already in place."

If Don Munson, Kent Countian, is pessimistic about vagaries of political will, the scientist is frustrated over the lack of available data. He points out that with an ecosystem as complex as the Chester River, hundreds of specific, accurate studies must be made of cause and effect. What does it mean to native species when large amounts of heavy metals are found in the bottom sediments? Anything? Nothing? What factors do salinity and acidity levels play? Why are the oysters gone, while clams flourish?

The many aspects of life on and along the river: above, a combine cuts swaths of hay; above right, a log canoe race provides unique recreation; right, Bates Walls, local crabber, measures a "keeper," a blue crab whose tips span at least five inches.

"If nothing else," he adds, "Washington College is in a unique position to begin to study the river closely. If the resources become available, we could set up a wet lab right on the river and start to look for answers. I feel that we owe it to the community and future generations to help solve the river's problems."

Wally Miller is a life-long resident of Kent County. As a boy, he grew up working on the river. He is a farmer and is actively engaged in the business of aquaculture. He is also one of three Kent County Commissioners.

Miller is known for pulling no punches. Like many native Kent Countians, if he has an opinion, by God he'll speak his mind.

"Is the river in bad shape?" he asks rhetorically. "I think so, but I honestly don't know how bad it is. And I believe that on one side of the argument, particularly from environmentalists, you have some pretty strong statements being made that, in my opinion, aren't worth a damn because the facts aren't there to back them up.

"You see, the truth of the matter is, nobody really knows. Sure the river is not in the same shape that it was 60 years ago, but neither am I. Change is inevitable. Who's to say the condition of the river isn't a cyclical thing? We simply don't know.

"I can say that the water quality has gotten worse, but I can't prove it. There were no studies done 20, 40, 100 years ago."

By his own admission, Miller hates regulation. He sees it as too often taking a serious problem and making things worse, all at the taxpayers' expense. Maryland's recently designated critical areas could be a vivid case in point.

Miller was, until recently, a member of the controversial Chesapeake Bay Critical Areas Commission. The regulations which the Commission put in place a few years ago were intended to improve and protect the Bay watershed. Have they made a difference? "Well, I'll say one definite effect Critical Areas has had on Kent County—it's made a few people very rich." By placing strict limits on development along the river's shoreline, the economics of supply and demand have significantly inflated the value of waterfront property.

Has it stopped shoreline development? The answer is no, says Miller. Part of the law states that property within the "critical" areas can be developed at no more than one lot per twenty acres. That would seem to spread things out quite a bit. But suppose you own a 400-acre farm that borders, let's say, Langford Creek. According to the law, you can use the entire 400 acres in the calculation and legally put 20 one acre lot sites right on the creek. As long as you leave the other 380 acres alone, say for farming purposes, you're covered. And since most of the hundreds of miles of shoreline property in Kent and Queen Anne's counties is part of large farms, development has literally been pushed toward the tributaries that the law was designed to protect.

And how has this made people rich? The law has made waterfront property a finite commodity. Thus an unimproved, one-acre building lot can now fetch more than a quarter of a million dollars.

Despite what he considers misdirected efforts, Wally Miller remains hopeful. "To be honest with you, the people of my generation did not have the benefit of ecological awareness that younger people have today. The concern of the younger generation is much stronger, and growing all the time. For this reason, I'm optimistic."

John Wilson is in a unique position to discuss the political and ecological trends which have touched the river. He has worked with the National Park Service, the Maryland Department of Natural Resources, and is currently involved in the Wild and Scenic Rivers Program, which recently conducted a "resource inventory [to] assess the natural, cultural, and recreational resource values of 25 Maryland rivers."

Using those criteria, the rivers of Maryland were rated, then grouped in three categories. "Category #1 Rivers" were those which "possess a composite resource value with greater than State significance." The Chester River was one of only four to receive this highest rating. (The other three are also Eastern Shore rivers - the Choptank, Nanticoke, and Blackwater.)

To those who have spent any time near the Chester River, the designation is no surprise. In terms of "natural resource," the Chester is the wintering home of an estimated 200,000 Canada geese — more than twice the number of any other river watershed. The river is a haven for two endangered species: the bald eagle and the Delmarva fox squirrel. Yearly clam harvests rival that of all New England states. The tributaries are important breeding grounds for many native fish species - including the striped bass. The best crabs available in the state are caught in the Chester.

For these reasons, a growing number of people are becoming actively engaged in protecting the river from further damage. John Wilson is one. With the help of the Chesapeake Bay Foundation, Wilson and a small group of concerned residents founded the

The river that I as a nine-year-old knew was gentle and giving. On a quiet, lonely dock far up the creek, I could move slowly from piling to piling, peering into the water, dip-net in hand, waiting for the glint of blue a few feet down. Carefully, silently, I'd lower the net, then in one quick sweep, pull up the startled creature which seconds before had been grazing or resting on the mossy flanks of the piling. A few hours of patient watching could yield a half-dozen rowdy, spitting crabs. I could dump them on the ground and endlessly watch these fierce sons of Mars parade backwards and sideways, never forward, with claws raised in comic defiance.

Or, when the moon was right and tide was low, I could put on an old pair of tennis shoes (the only time during the summer when such a thing was done) and wade through the soft shore grass, squinting through the water's glare. In a few seconds, I might see movement; my net sweeps down and out, and another timid softcrab lands in a basket that bobs obediently behind me, half submerged and floating securely within an old inner-tube. Usually I would quit before much time had passed because my basket was full.

Is change inevitable? Today my romantic vision is all but gone. The water is too dark to bother looking into for crabs. Most of the grass is gone, and the softcrabs have found different, murkier hiding places. The workboat and trotline compete with roaring speedboats and stodgy cabin-cruisers whose wakes nibble incessantly at the fallen shoreline. The river's once bountiful oyster beds are silted over. The little house on the creek is now called "waterfront property" and will inevitably be bought for the equivalent of a waterman's lifetime income.

A nine-year-old now timidly asks permission to sit on the dock to fish. He may take a break, to lift a heavy chunk of rip-rap from the shoreline and heave it to hear the plunk of muddy water.

To find work and affordable housing, he will eventually move away, and never know.

Chester River Association (CRA) in 1987. For the past few years, CRA has become an active voice.

Wilson speaks eloquently of the current condition of the river, and directs his thoughts to a fundamental problem that will be most difficult to deal with:

"It's what I often refer to as 'the tyranny of small decisions.' Every person that lives in the watershed will at some time contribute to the problem — the property owner that clears the shoreline and puts down rip-rap so he has an unobstructed view of the water, the guy on High Street [in Chestertown] that washes his car, the farmer that chooses to put just a little more fertilizer on his fields this year, the boat owner that doesn't mind losing a little oil from a leaky engine.

"It may seem like a small and isolated decision at the time, but there are now 13 million people in the Bay watershed, and tens of thousands near the Chester. It all adds up. What organizations like CRA and programs like Scenic Rivers are trying to do is make people aware of the problems and focus on the possible solutions, to let them know that there is something everyone can do, everyday."

Doctors in Research: Two Who Search For Medical Miracles

by Marcia C. Landskroener

Some doctors cannot accept pain and suffering as a given. They are compelled to find causes, solutions, and the means to prevent debilitating illnesses. They are physicians who go one step further to understand the human body, looking for answers in some of the best laboratories, clinics and medical institutions in the country. Some of them also happen to be Washington College alumni.

In this story we examine two such doctors who are at the forefront of research in their fields—Dr. Ralph Snyderman '61, an expert in rheumatology and immunology, and Dr. Karen A. Johnson '68, who is involved in cancer research.

For Dr. Snyderman, medicine has been a lifelong calling, and he has successfully filled the roles of physician, researcher, educator and administrator with aplomb. For Dr. Johnson, a soft-spoken woman who sees the world through the eyes of a chemist, the practice of medicine is a second career to which she turned in order to give her analytical abilities true connection through patient welfare.

It is the end of a long day of meetings, introductions and telephone calls, just weeks after moving his family and his files from the West Coast to Durham, North Carolina, where he was recently installed as chancellor for health affairs and dean of the School of Medicine at Duke University. Ralph Snyderman '61 is pleasant, self-assured and patient, exuding the presence of a man who has taken rightful possession of the leadership role at a distinguished medical institution which he intends to bring to the very forefront of patient care, biomedical research, and medical education.

A distinguished physician, research scientist and medical administrator who most recently led research and development efforts at Genentech Inc., an innovative biomedical research facility in San Francisco, California, Snyderman has come a long way since his days at WC. As an undergraduate he balanced a disciplined, science-oriented academic track, a love for beach parties at Tolchester, an undistinguished but spirited athletic career and social member status with the Phi Sigma Kappa fraternity. Yet he still maintains that balance of intellect, determination and humor that makes a leader.

Dr. Snyderman is a man obsessed—obsessed with the mysteries of the body, the fascination of discovery and the art of healing. He distinctly remembers the time when he first decided to become a doctor. He was visiting his grandmother, who was ill in the hospital. He was 10 years old.

"I was filled with anticipation when I saw the doctor come down the hall, wondering what he would say, and I thought, 'I can't imagine anything more wonderful than to be a physician.'"

Eight years later, he expanded his horizons. He wrote in his high school yearbook that he wanted to become a medical researcher.

After two years at Brooklyn College, Snyderman transferred to Washington College, where he majored in psychology, minored in biology, and took special courses in genetics. By his senior year, he was spending hours at the National Library of Medicine, doing research for papers on genetics for biology professor Edgar Gwynn.

"I was anxious to go to a small liberal arts college with a pretty campus that could prepare me for medical school," says Snyderman. "I had spent all my time in Brooklyn, and it was important for me to see the world beyond that. I loved Washington College—it was a great place for me, and I realized when I interviewed for medical school (at State University of New York, Downstate Medical Center) that having come to Washington College helped me get in. During my interview with Dean Parkerson, I found out that they were very familiar with Washington College, and in fact, three WC students came after me in the years I was there."

His first efforts to unravel the mysteries of the body's immune system developed in medical school, and were reinforced during his internship and residency at Duke University. Ailments such as rheumatoid arthritis and immune deficiencies are "perplexing diagnostically," says Snyderman. "The mechanisms are poorly understood. It's amazing that in the development of higher life forms there evolved a system that could distinguish and identify the exact sites for the formation of antibodies."

He became involved in research in immunology, and specifically, inflammation, while doing wartime duty with the national health service. It was 1967, the height of the Vietnam War, and as part of the physicians' draft Snyderman was sent to the National Institutes of Health in Bethesda, Maryland. He spent four and a half years in the Immunology Section of the Laboratory of Microbiology and Immunology at the National Institute of Dental Research.

In 1972, Snyderman returned to Duke to teach and conduct research in the field of rheumatology and immunology. He rose through the ranks from assistant professor to full professor and chief of Duke's Division of Rheumatic and Genetic Diseases. In 1977 he was named director of the Laboratory of Immune Effector Function at the Howard Hughes Medical Institute, and in 1984 was named Frederic M. Hanes Professor of Medicine.

Snyderman was lured away from Duke to Genentech, where as senior vice president for medical research and development he was responsible for bringing in new research projects and overseeing the various phases of gene manipulation: taking a particular cell out of a gene and introducing a host bacteria to create a therapeutic agent.

Snyderman saw "some very exciting AIDS research" at Genentech which involved an agent known as CD-4. The modified gene acts as a camouflage and blocks the virus's ability to attach to cells. The body is flooded with this "decoy" and the AIDS virus attaches to the artificial protein instead of the cell.

Genentech took this project to patient trials in record time, says Snyder-research that led to Federal Drug Administration approval of experimental drugs.

At Genentech, Snyderman was studying the chemical mechanisms of white blood cells, trying to determine how they migrate from the circulation system to the sites of penetration of viruses or bacteria. This information will help define specific biochemical binding sites.

Another of his projects involved the development of proteins that could modify the body's immune response. "With some diseases, such as rheumatoid arthritis, the body's immune response is heightened and the body attacks itself," explains Snyderman. "The proteins used for such patients would decrease the immune response. With immune deficiency diseases, such as AIDS, the body's immune response is weakened, and we need to increase the immune response."

These proteins were created through man. "From cloning to clinic was well under two years," he says, a feat not generally achieved in the development of new drugs. CD-4 passed the initial safety tests and entered clinical trials during Snyderman's tenure at Genentech, he says, but "it's still too early to see if it's effective." It is now being administered to patients who have early manifestations of the disease.

How do scientists determine what agents might work? "Animal studies and a conceptual framework are good indicators," Snyderman says, "but a lot of it is judgment. Some companies are successful at it and some are not."

Genentech's track record has been good. Scientists there were responsible for developing a human growth hormone, which has effectively been administered to children to bring them to normal stature. The development of Activase, which by dissolving blood clots has significantly reduced the number of deaths associated with heart attacks, is another important advance brought to market by Genentech.

Snyderman was very much a part of the approval process. "It's not an easy process" to get FDA approval, he says, yet he doesn't consider the FDA "the bad guy," hindering brilliant scientific research by dragging its feet on a drug that has been proven effective in the laboratory.

"At times I think the public has an unrealistic expectation of biomedical research," he says. "It is amazing to think how much we know, but it's even more amazing to think how much we don't know. Great ideas don't always work, and the FDA's difficult job is to determine whether the drug is safe and effective. Toxic effects take a long time to develop, and the drug may work in some patients, but not in others. By and large, the FDA performs very well."

What convinced Snyderman to leave the management of private research to return to Duke University?

It is a homecoming for him, and a challenge that he could not refuse. "I spent much of my life at Duke, and they've offered me an opportunity for a fulfilling experience as a researcher and a physician. My goal is to make it one of the very best medical institutions in the world, dedicated to the best patient care, an innovative medical school and a world-renowned biomedical research center."

He describes Duke University Medical Center as a three-legged stool, dependent on the strength of each aspect—patient care, education and research—to stand firmly. "I intend to fully support each of the three underpinnings, and given the resources—the people, the facilities and the finances—I hope to create an atmosphere of intellectual ferment that lets people know that the most exciting things in medicine are happening here."

In his first few weeks back home in Durham, he says, his first objective ("after locating the men's room and the parking lot") is to gain the respect of the people who will be involved on the leadership team for the medical center. "They need to know I'm a forceful leader who can move Duke ahead into the 1990's and beyond."

He is involved now in recruiting new department chairmen and will be developing a series of goals for the Medical Center. "There's a lot of good will here; they wouldn't have asked me if they didn't think I could do it, but I need to prove myself."

The 1,800 faculty members, 400 medical students, and patients at Duke University Medical Center are not likely to be disappointed.

Karen A. Johnson '68, a medical oncologist at Georgetown University's Vincent T. Lombardi Cancer Research Center in Washington, D.C., too often has witnessed the pain and sorrow cancer patients and their families suffer.

"After you've gone through the problems of a malignancy," she says, "you long for a situation in which people don't have to face that."

So Johnson, a native of Rock Hall, MD, and the daughter of another Washington College alumna, Audrey Clough Johnson '38, has devoted her research efforts to cancer prevention.

Cancer control is a balanced approach to a medical problem that will strike one in four Americans. Of the three levels of control—prevention, eradication, and treatment to extend life—prevention has had the least emphasis, she says.

"It's like having an untapped resource [to fight cancer]. It may be some years before people come around to emphasize prevention, but if you do some sensible things early, you may not have to resort to toxic treatments later on that don't always work. What I practice is just good old Eastern Shore common sense. As they say, 'An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure.'"

A practicing physician and an assistant professor of medicine at Georgetown University Hospital as well, Johnson still considers herself first and foremost a chemist. She discovered her love of chemistry under the tutelage of the late Dr. Joseph McLain '37, then chairman of the WC's chemistry department. Dr. McLain's two areas of particular interest were pyrotechnics and crystals, she recalls.

"To me, that symbolizes two opposites in the spectrum of chemistry—fire and ice," says Johnson, "as well as the excitement and the beauty of chemistry."

Formerly a science associate at the National Cancer Institute where she was part of the Division of Cancer Prevention and Control, she now conducts her preventive research in the private sector at the Lombardi Center, which specializes in breast cancer, one of the most prevalent forms of cancer.

The simplest way to prevent cancer, she says, is to make healthy lifestyle changes: quit smoking, eat a healthful diet, and avoid overexposure to the sun.

Yet this approach can be difficult and ineffective for some people. That's when an active chemo-preventive approach, using vitamins and anti-oxidants, plays a key role. An anti-oxidant is an agent that hinders molecular changes in the body's tissue. Some pharmaceuticals or diet supplements may prevent a premalignant condition by neutralizing substances that contribute to cancer, such as nitrates in the diet. Other supplements, such as Vitamin A compounds or retinoids, may actually reverse a premalignant change in tissue.

"The theory is that we can compensate for the change and prevent the tissue from becoming more abnormal," she says.

This chemical approach to prevention is relatively new. The Memorial Sloan-Kettering Cancer Center is conducting trials using Omega-3 fatty acids, an anti-oxidant, in the prevention of breast cancer. Italian scientists are conducting similar trials with a Vitamin A analog in the prevention of the disease.

"We are looking for chemical factors: oxidation and metabolic profiles which indicate the different ways the body handles chemicals," Johnson says. "And then we try to categorize our patients: Is there a pattern that indicates they metabolize drugs or chemicals differently from other (low-risk) people?"

Johnson gathers her research data as a practicing physician in the clinic three days a week. "The patients are really important to our efforts to develop prevention," she says. "What have they been exposed to? What are their risk factors? We can work back from that point to see what they have in common, and that leads us to do research to block cancer-causing pathways."

She also works closely with members of the pharmacology unit, who specialize in the oxidative metabolism of drugs. Together they can discover patterns that indicate how cancer can be inhibited, or that a particular supplement is effective in reversing abnormal changes in tissue.

Right now, Johnson and her colleagues are conducting feasibility studies to administer various supplements to patients at risk.

Danazol, a hormonal manipulator used to treat fibrocystic breast disease and endometriosis, is one drug she and her colleagues have considered for use in a chemo-preventive program, but the Federal Drug Administration would be reluctant to approve its use for patients who have not exhibited a pathological condition, she says. They may have more success, she says, with Pyridoxine, or Vitamin B-6, for the purpose of prevention, and generally developing Danazol for administration to higher-risk patients.

Another aspect of the research being done at the Lombardi Center involves "investigational therapy," comparing a new combination of drugs with standard treatment in an attempt to find a more effective therapy.

Johnson is also working on a proposal to establish a cancer information service at the Lombardi Cancer Research Center, which may open as early as January 1990. "Dietary intervention will be an important part of this program," she says. "We'll be encouraging people to increase their intake of fruits and vegetables to increase levels of Vitamins A and C."

Johnson and her fellow researchers, under the direction of Dr. Marc Lippman, an international authority on breast cancer, are also seeking support for large-scale trials to test various supplements over an extended period of time. Because breast cancer is so prevalent, says Johnson, it is not difficult to find people at high risk. The objective is to find a way to lower the incidence of cancer, and then focus on mechanistic details of how the supplement works.

Although it may be several years until scientists determine which chemical agents are most effective at cancer prevention, time is of the essence.

Dr. John Baylor, a distinguished epidemiologist involved in cancer research, warned in the New England Journal of Medicine two years ago that we are not yet winning the war against cancer. Mortality rates have not decreased. More recently, his concerns have been justified by an increase in breast cancer incidence.

The problem, says Johnson, is that technological advances such as the mammographic screening are not reaching all women at risk, and too many women are not coming to doctors in time.

"We recommend a yearly mammogram for women aged 40 and over," says Johnson, "yet we see a lot of women in the clinic aged 65 or 70 who have never had a mammogram. Most of the women who come to us already have a reason to be concerned, such as a family history of breast cancer or the discovery of a lump in the breast."

The risk factors for breast cancer have long been known. If a woman has a close relative who was diagnosed with breast cancer before the age of 55, she, too, is more likely to develop the disease. Other risk factors include the age at which a woman began menstruation (early age indicates high risk), and the age at which she first became pregnant (later age increases risk).

"Our lifestyles sometimes go against prevention and contribute to the disease," says Johnson. "We can't very well tell women to become pregnant before the age of 20, although studies have shown that those women are half as likely to develop breast cancer as women who never deliver a child."

For Johnson, cancer research is a second career. A chemistry major at Washington College, she earned a Ph.D. in inorganic chemistry at the University of Delaware, and then spent five years at the DuPont Chemical Company as a research chemist.

"I was specializing in carpet fiber, and realized I didn't want to do that for the rest of my life," she says, "so, at 31, I headed off to medical school."

After finishing her medical studies at Thomas Jefferson University in Philadelphia, Johnson completed a three-year residency in internal medicine at Georgetown University Hospital. She was awarded a fellowship in medical oncology at Georgetown and then took a visiting position at the National Cancer Institute, which brings together scientists from varied technical areas for orientation to cancer control.

It was here that she met Dr. Lippman, who last July brought more than 40 scientists, including Johnson, with him to Georgetown's Lombardi Cancer Research Center to establish new efforts to combat cancer.

"It's an exciting time to be at Georgetown," says Johnson. "I wanted to have a chance to improve the odds against cancer, and I felt I had a better chance to do that in a university setting. The challenge is to find safe substances that protect us from cancer."

Alumni Elect Two To Board Of Governors

The results of the May ballot are in: Washington College alumni elected Kevin O'Keefe '74 and Ellen Corddry Adkins '49 to serve six-year terms on the College's Board of Visitors and Governors.

O'Keefe is president of the Baltimore-based advertising and public relations agency The Sandler Group. A member of the College's Visiting Committee, O'Keefe has served in various capacities related to development and college relations. He also serves on the board of directors of the Baltimore Chamber Orchestra and the Better Business Bureau of Maryland, and was elected to this year's Leadership Class of the Greater Baltimore Committee.

Adkins is the director of public relations for E. S. Adkins and Company, a building materials and development firm in Salisbury, Maryland. The wife of the late E. Stanton Adkins, who served on the Board from 1965 until 1971, she is a past member of the Alumni Council.

CLASS NOTES

'29 Walter T. Morris has been selected as "Extension Pioneer" by the Kent Co. Extension Advisory Council. "Petey" has been a member and leader of the 4-H Clover Calf Club for more than 50 years, frequently cooperating with Extension by holding demonstrations and permitting research test plots on his farm. He has been a board member of Choptank Electric Cooperative since 1962.

'30 Bill "Red" Burk and Helen Russell met again at their 50th class reunion in 1980, and were married in 1985 after making several cross country trips from Phoenix to Chestertown, where they now reside. Red has been forced to retire from golf temporarily, due to two hospital stays for a heart condition.

'33 Mary Elizabeth Walbert Black retired from teaching in Dade County, FL. She now substitute teaches in Martin County schools. A member of the Omicron Chapter of Alpha Delta Kappa International Sorority, she enjoys ballroom dancing, bowling and golf.

'38 Clarkes Benham, of Wilbraham, MA, recently completed building a "little Roxy" basement theater—complete with stage, projection booth, ticket booth and gallery of posters, stills and glitzy memorabilia—for the showing of c. 1900-1930 films he's collected over the years.

'39 Charles F.W. Anderson retired after 45 years in aerospace with Martin, Boeing, Grumman, and Honeywell. He is now on amateur radio (call NF3X) as emergency coordinator for Washington Co., Public-Service Communications, and secretary of local radio club, SKYWARN, in Hagerstown, MD. He reports that son George '71 is teaching at Yale and daughter Barbara '77 is married to Scotty McBride '77 and living in Bowie.

Clarence L. Kibler is the 1989 president of the United Way of Caroline County, MD. "Kibbie" retired as meteorologist with the U.S. Weather Bureau in 1977, now devotes his time to volunteer work.

Maryanna Reed Maguire is a trustee of Baltimore Community Colleges and on the Board of Governors of the Maryland School for the Deaf. She lives in Towson.

'43 Theodore Kurze is moving to Chestertown this fall. He will be a Senior Fellow in philosophy and psychology at Washington College.

'47 Ed Athey was the principal speaker at a dinner honoring George "Gimp" Carrington, Frostburg State College's successful all-round athletic coach of the pre-World War II era and our Coach's coach.

'50 The Board of Trustees of Berkeley Divinity at Yale has unanimously voted to award Anthony Donaldson Tall a Doctor of Humane Letters degree at their Convocation in October.

'52 William V. Bell of Bridgeport, PA, formerly a deputy sheriff in the Real Estate Division, is now serving as "Court Crier" for Common Pleas Court Judge William T. Nicholas in Montgomery County, PA.

After 25 years with the DuPont Co., Jim Taylor is retiring to pursue his avocation of show horse training and boarding, "with time off for good behavior for a few rounds of golf and travel."

'58 Robert Colborn is an administrator/attorney in Edgewater, MD.

Ann Weber, assistant professor at Carroll Community College, received the Maryland State Board for Community College's Excellence in Teaching Award. A full-time instructor at the Carroll campus since 1979, she has worked to establish courses in American and world literatures. Ann is currently working with other college representatives on a pilot program for integrating women's studies into the curriculum of community colleges.

'59 Sally Ann Groome Cooper was voted Educator of the Year by the Howard County Chamber of Commerce and County Council, and was a semi-finalist (in Maryland) for the Presidential Award for Excellence in Science Teaching. She also was chosen to participate in the first Governor's Academy for Science and Math Teachers.

Ron O'Leary became a grandparent for the first time on March 23rd. His older son, Kevin, is an assistant lacrosse coach at the University of Maryland.

James Potter and his wife, Nell, both practicing physicians, could not attend Reunion because they were hosting Mrs. Marlin Perkins at the fifth anniversary of the zoo they established in Pensacola, FL. Their zoo, The Zoo, one of 138 in the US certified by the American Association of Zoological Parks, has just opened an additional 30 acres with a 1/3 scale model train ride through open areas.

'61 Robert D. Cheel has retired from teaching and is now employed as a real estate salesman with Gary Hart & Associates in Catonsville, MD.

'62 Robert E. and Diana Dibble '65 Leitch "sure know how to have fun at home," according to Delaware Today magazine that featured their museum-like house in its April issue. Robert is a Ph.D agri-chemist at Du Pont Co., and frequent flier, skilled at garnering evidence of far-flung cultures. Diana is a psychologist, homemaker and occasional cooking teacher with certificates from Geneva's La Varenne and Paris's Cordon Blue.

Florence Nash Rieken has been associate professor of biological sciences at Wor-Wic Tech Community College since 1982 and involved with nursing education at the Associate Degree and Diploma levels since 1968. She enjoys seeing students who are "scared of sciences" gain facility in both anatomy and physiology, microbiology and nutrition.

'65 David E. Morgan settled in San Francisco a couple of years ago where he watches Carolyn Wean do editorials on KPIX Channel 5. She is general manager.

Glen R. Shipway has been promoted to senior vice president of market operations by the National Association of Securities Dealers, Inc. Glen will manage the services to the automated quotations market which are provided from the NASD Financial Center in New York City.

'68 King Seegar says he has suffered the "full catastrophe": he's married with a 3-year-old daughter, has a busy pediatric practice in a rural West Virginia health clinic, and owns a big old Victorian brick house and a "terrible" car. He still gets overseas from time to time, but is not skiing.

Michael Tucker, a finance professor at Fairfield University in Connecticut, is a consultant to industry and the owner of a retail store.

'69 Eric G. Koehler, of West Lake, OH, recently joined PinnAcle Media, the broadcast division of Wyse Advertising, as its director of client services.

'70 Sigrid "Biddy" Ben-Avi Balmer has been living since 1973 in London where she trained as a veterinary nurse. She is married to a vet and has two girls, aged two and five years.

Barbara Osborn Kreamer is serving her second term in the House of Delegates representing District 34, Harford County, MD.

'72 Margaret O. Burke reports that she is "finally finishing" her education. She started WC in 1968, and returned for her degree in 1981. She earned an M.D. in 1985 from the University of Maryland, and has since been in Columbus, Ohio, working on her residency in physical medicine and rehabilitation. After finishing this last year as chief resident, she is looking forward to her new position as Medical Director of Spinal Cord Injury at H. J. Thoms Rehabilitation Hospital in Asheville, NC.

'73 Michal George Dorman is home raising a daughter, Christina Elaine, born June 20, 1988, and a son, Robert James, born July 17, 1985.

Teacher Witnesses A Chinese Lesson in Democracy

Catherine Beck '87 first thought of her teaching job in China as a chance for travel and new experiences. By the end of her year there, as the pro-democracy movement reached a bloody climax in Tienanmen Square, she had gotten more than she bargained for.

"The pro-democracy movement changed my perceptions about almost everything," says Beck, a teacher of American culture and conversational English at Nanjing Normal University and a journalistic stringer covering the protests for the Beijing bureaus of Time Magazine and United Press International. Beck left China for Hong Kong on June 14.

Her last days in China were tense. "People from the Security Bureau were following me, because throughout the protests I had been in contact with student activists, writing a series of interviews. I had become friends with many of the people involved, I knew one of the 21 "most wanted" people, and that was of great interest to the Chinese government."

Beck says that she did not fear for her own safety—"I figured the worst they could do was kick me out of the country"—but she did fear for her Chinese friends. The weekend before she left, she helped hide a young man in a room until he could board a train out of the city under the cloak of darkness. She does not know what became of him, or of her many other students and friends; she can only hope they got out safely and that she won't read of their arrest in the paper.

Ten days after the army crackdown in Tienanmen Square, she left Nanjing for Hong Kong, where she intends to continue covering, and supporting, the movement.

On the day of a telephone interview with the Magazine, she was waiting for news about a journalistic position. Beck is living in an apartment with several Hong Kong Chinese actively supportive of the pro-democracy movement.

"It's frustrating to be out of China; I feel as though I've deserted my friends. Yet as one of my roommates said, 'If you want to help China, help us.' When you talk of the Chinese, you must also speak of those living in Taiwan, and those in Hong Kong, and the Chinese all over the world. The pro-democracy movement has moved outside, the people have been subdued, but the movement is not dead. The government can suppress the people, but it cannot suppress the intellectual power of this group. They cannot kill every young person. There is still hope."

Her experience in Nanjing was "unbelievably sad," she says. She had lived with students active in the Nanjing Student Union. She had shared their idealistic joy and hopefulness in their peaceful demonstrations. The Chinese media was free for two weeks, and was filled with pro-democracy news. Then it was as if the rug had been pulled out from under them.

"One by one, my friends left or could no longer speak with me. The government clamped down on the media again, and sources say that there were people with guns in the TV stations, telling them what to say. After that, the students relied on Western media for their news, but 80% of China's population is in the countryside, and the only information they get is from the official media. Even people on the streets of Nanjing have a distorted view of what happened in Beijing."

The coming months will not be easy ones for the Chinese, Beck predicts. "The government will continue its propaganda campaign, more people will be arrested, the economy will continue to decline, and the pro-democracy campaign will spread. I have no doubt it will surge again. The government cannot kill off something this hopeful with brute force and lies."

Art Dealer Hits A Homer With "Diamond Gold"

By Jack Gilden '87

Set on a lush green canvas and pieced together by intricate yet passionate strokes, the game of baseball is, according to legions of devoted fans, a work of art.

For Bill Goff '69, though, this image is no mere metaphor. The 42-year-old former philosophy major is the curator of "Diamond Gold: Fine Art in Baseball," an exhibition on display this summer at the National Baseball Hall of Fame and Museum to commemorate the shrine's 50th birthday.

As reported by The Sporting News, the show includes paintings by Andy Jurinko, a drawing by Rockwell Kent, pastels by Elaine de Kooning, wood carving by Dave Greene and sculpture by Clemente Spampinato and Jay O'Meilie.

The exhibition has 95 works," Goff says, "and the pieces range from the late 19th century to the very contemporary. There is a large range in style as well — everything from totally abstract to photo real."

The exhibit is also interesting in that it meshes standard art forms like painting and bronze sculpture with less traditional expressions, including hooked rugs and even marionettes.

This is Goff's second exhibition at the Hall of Fame (he is the only outsider to ever arrange an art exhibit for the museum) and just the latest chapter in a struggle-filled career that is now a bona fide success story.

Even though he "can't draw a straight line and, until recently, wasn't a very good athlete," Goff has been an art dealer for the past 18 years, and has spent the last 12 specializing in sports-related art. "I started by working at my mother's Gallery in Long Island in 1971," Goff says, "But when my wife (a lawyer) took a job with ABC Sports, that made me realize my real love was in sports."

In 1977 he opened what he today calls his "courageous but frivolous" effort — Spectrum, a gallery specializing in sports. "I was just about turning the corner in 1981," he says, "when Reagan came into office. My business dropped off by 90 percent. I sold."

Goff continued to run Spectrum for the new owner until the business folded in 1984. But the end of the gallery was just the beginning for Goff. He still believed in sports art, but this time he approached it from a different perspective.

"The problem with the gallery," Goff says, "was that I had huge overhead and a small client base. This time I decided to reverse them. I started commissioning artists to do sports-related work, and then I was selling the prints through the mail right from my apartment."

That didn't mean there still weren't some kinks to work out. Goff says: "I started with prints of four players: Reggie Jackson, Ron Guidry, Pete Rose and Harmon Killebrew. Well, that summer Jackson became a free agent and left the Yankees for the California Angels; Guidry had arm troubles; and Rose jumped around from Philly to Montreal to Cincinnati. I learned that people's feelings about a player are easily changed."

So Goff had to find a baseball subject matter in which people's feelings didn't change and he finally landed on his big idea with baseball stadiums. "Everyone in the world has a great memory of a stadium," he says. "And they are fixed memories. No one who once loved Ebbets Field hates it today."

Maybe, but Goff, for one, is loving ballparks and the sentimental feelings they induce, more than ever. Last year he sold an average of ten prints a day at $95 to $190 apiece. Now, bolstered by the publicity from the Hall of Fame show (both The Sporting News and Sports Illustrated did stories on him) he is selling 30 prints a day at $150 to $200 per shot.

"Do a little simple math and you'll see I'm making some money," he says, nonplussed by it all.

It's taken some time, but finally Bill Goff is a hit.

Rock's Approach to Development

by Andrea E. Kehoe '89

The real estate development business, known for figures such as Donald Trump, seems a long way from Richmond House, Washington College's literary utopia of the '70s. Until you talk to Leslie H. Kitchen Rock '77, that is.

The president of MLR Development, based in Baltimore, Rock concedes that the occupation is sometimes considered "sordid," linked in the popular imagination with deceit in pursuit of profit. But she believes that a new breed of real estate developers has emerged.

"It's not that way now, with the younger generation," she says. "This generation is more honest, and they don't have that kind of ego to serve. It doesn't have to be that way — sleazy and sordid."

MLR Development, named for her husband Michael, "the idea man," and herself, puts Rock's business philosophy into practice. In addition to developing townhouses and shopping centers, the company is working with the city of Baltimore to develop the nation's second women's center, which would place a range of women's services, from the League of Women Voters to the Afro-American Women's Caucus, in one building. One floor would be reserved for female-owned businesses.

One of the firm's latest projects is a proposed bed and breakfast operation for Baltimore's Inner Harbor that would serve as the East Coast flagship inn for Radisson Country Hospitality Inns, a new subsidiary of the Radisson hotel chain. The $3.2 million inn would recreate an 18th century meeting hall that stood where the Baltimore Arena is now.

"We're doing things that don't rape and pillage the landscape," she says. "To make money you don't have to build something that's ugly."

Rock is proud of her company's development of a swim club for the historic Baltimore communities of Federal Hill and Otterbein, where she lives. She also acts as president of Festival Homes, which concentrates on homebuilding.

Like the new generation of real estate developers she describes, Rock finds time in her crowded schedule for community service. She recently completed a term as co-chairman of the board of Young Audiences of Maryland, a non-profit group that sponsors arts performances for schoolchildren.

Also, Baltimore Mayor Kurt Schmoke has appointed her to the Baltimore City Commission for Women; as chair of the outreach committee, she recently led the 25-member panel in hosting visitors from Baltimore's sister city in Japan.

Rock enjoys the networking opportunity the commission provides. She knows of only two other female real estate developers in the city.

"I've found that basically what you have out there is the old boys' club."

MLR Development has exceeded its original business projections, and now Rock plans to focus on maintaining the ground gained rather than continue the accelerated growth.

"The only way to keep yourself from going nuts from work is to cultivate your private life," she says. The former humanities major continues to read voraciously, and designs what she calls "self-studies" on such topics as Russian literature when she lacks the free time to take a course.

She credits much of her success at the conference table to skills she learned at Washington College.

"As I spend 90 per cent of my life negotiating, which is what developers do, I go back to my liberal arts education. All that negotiating is a creative thing," she says.

Rock says her refusal to take "no" for an answer when problems arise with a deal is also a result of her education.

"That comes from the open-minded outlook you acquire in the liberal arts," she says. "You're taught that life is a series of possibilities. You examine all the possibilities, all the angles. A liberal arts background helps you to think that way."

It's Washington College Calling!

by F. David Wheelan '78

While it is customary in our annual report for me to echo the College's sincere thanks to the thousands of alumni, parents and friends who supported us last year, I would like to address a few thoughts to those who elected not to make a gift this year. While it is true that Washington College boasts one of the highest percentages of alumni giving in the country, it's a rare day in the Development Office when staffers don't think about this segment of our alumni body.

At the end of every spring, the development staff, myself included, make last minute calls to alumni to ask for contributions. We hear some interesting stories. One young alum who was pleased and excited by all the new developments on campus was asked to make a modest gift. She replied that the College "was doing very well without me" and that "the College has made so much money" she wondered why she was being called at all.

It should come as no surprise that the College's chief development officer would disagree. This year we must find more than $2.5 million in student scholarship funds alone. Considering annual giving raised approximately $1.1 million last year, it should not be hard to understand the necessity of our work.

The act of writing a check, no matter what the size, is perhaps the most dramatic and symbolic action an alumnus can take. It goes beyond the simple response to a not-for-profit institution. To support one's alma mater goes to the fundamental aspects of citizenship. It is a vote of confidence in the value of higher education, the need for it, and the promise that it holds for society and country. I wonder if that message has been heard.

Some alumni responses in refusing to make a contribution are humorous. One alum will never support the College because he had "unjustly" received a D in a course taught by Dr. Duxton in 1938. Another argued that until baseball received a greater percentage of the athletic budget he wouldn't give a "red cent." Just as these are fairly typical responses during a night of calling, so is the bafflement of our student helpers who wonder why some alumni have such a narrow view of their college experience.

My plea is that one look at the larger picture. All institutions have aspects of folly, including Washington College. The more important questions every alumnus must ask are: Did I personally benefit from the College? Does what I learned there continue to enrich my life? Is its mission worth supporting now, and is there a role for Washington College in this country? Invariably, my answer to all of these questions is yes.

Since William Smith opened its doors in 1782, Washington College has done one thing perfectly. It has, indeed, "taught young people to think well." In every issue of the Magazine, signs of excellence emerge from the ranks of our alumni body. Our "product" is a curious, competitive, well-rounded individual, invested in community and strong in values. The imprint of the institution on these individuals is both permanent and invaluable. We in the Development Office only wish it were reciprocal.

It is impossible to think of an institution where one's contribution goes further and is more productively spent than at this College. The total cost of actually raising funds is approximately 5 cents on the dollar, including postage, telephone calls, printing, staff salaries, travel, etc. The balance of the gift, 95 percent, goes directly into student scholarships, faculty salaries, and the upkeep of the physical plant. We'd like to think it is one of the best investments around.

Yet the important point here is that Washington College is now, and will in the foreseeable future, be a fragile institution. It is unlikely one individual will provide that multi-million dollar gift that liberates us from the hazards of modern economic life. The College must continue to count on its alumni for support.

The work of the Development Office will not cease. At times, we may interrupt your evenings and fill your mailbox. While we would prefer some other means of attracting your attention, we will nonetheless sing a song for your special consideration. It is an appeal that goes to the heart of our past, and it will undoubtedly pave the way for its future. Yes, Washington College is calling! We hope you will listen, but more importantly, that you will reach into your pockets as well as your memories, and continue a tradition which honors the past and educates the future.

David Wheelan is vice president for development and college relations.

(And If You Did, Here's Your Chance To Be A Sports Hero All Over Again.)

1988-89 was a banner year for varsity sports at Washington College; 58.2% of all games and matches were victories. In all, 14 WC athletes were named All-Americans.

With the creation of a new REC Sports program, recreational sports have become increasingly popular on campus. Last year 53% of the student body participated in recreational, educational and/or competitive sports.

In basketball, Washington College proved to be the best of Maryland's NCAA Division III teams, finishing the season among the top 25 Division III competitors in the nation.

The Stumbling Block

Washington College is hard hit by cabin fever during the winter months. After being cooped up in classrooms and dormitories for weeks, most students welcome the opportunity to shoot a few baskets, or run a few laps.

But they face a formidable stumbling block: finding indoor space to let off steam is next to impossible. Just ask the members of the men's varsity lacrosse team. Cain Gymnasium scheduling is so tight that half the team members report for practice at 10 p.m. Their less fortunate teammates tumble in at 6 a.m. Hardly ideal training conditions for a Division III powerhouse that's been a finalist in eight of the last 15 national championships—but understandable, considering that eight men's and women's varsity teams, a cheerleading squad, and the recreational sports program must vie for the same practice space.

Conditions don't improve much once you leave the gym. There aren't enough playing fields to meet the burgeoning women's and recreational sports programs. Washington College's tennis courts are buckling and cracking. And the fitness center, located in the basement of Cain Gymnasium, is too small—and poorly ventilated—to accommodate comfortably the 600-700 people who go there each week to work out.

The Cain Gymnasium was built in 1957, when the College's enrollment was less than 500. Enrollment today has nearly doubled, and participation in both recreational and intercollegiate sports programs has increased dramatically. When athletes on WC's 14 intercollegiate teams square off in competition, they face well-prepared opponents from colleges with state-of-the-art athletic facilities.

"The bottom line is this," says Geoff Miller, director of athletics and chairman of the physical education department, "In order to remain competitive both in the marketplace for student-athletes and on the playing court and field, Washington College must upgrade its athletic physical plant."

The Game Plan

What offers the most effective solution to the problem? A multi-purpose field house. The present game plan calls for a 35,000-square-foot complex to be connected to the Cain Gymnasium by a skylit atrium. The spacious facility will be named the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center, in honor of donor William B. Johnson's father, who was graduated from Washington College in 1911 and who at the time of his death was one of the most distinguished judges in the State of Maryland. The elder Johnson sent his two sons, William '40 and Rufus '42, to Washington College, and all three served on the College's Board of Visitors and Governors.

The complex will provide space for:

- three regulation size basketball courts, fully convertible for volleyball, tennis and badminton use.
- a two-lane jogging track located around the perimeter of the courts.
- two racquetball/handball courts (which can be converted for squash play).
- a spacious fitness center area.
- an aerobic dance/multi-purpose workout room.
- additional locker rooms, rest rooms and storage space.
- and parking around the complex for more than 200 cars.

Unlike the outmoded wooden floors currently used in the Cain Gymnasium, the field house's basketball courts will be equipped with a multi-purpose polyurethane (hard rubber) flooring. That means members of outdoor sports teams—like soccer, field hockey, baseball, softball, and lacrosse—will have more room to practice inside when it's raining or too cold. The flooring will also withstand the heavy foot traffic of a dance or indoor Commencement.

Competitive athletes at Washington College (about one-quarter of the student body) and REC Sports participants (another one-quarter of the student body) won't be the only ones to benefit from the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center. The indoor jogging track will be open for every student and faculty member to use from morning until night. Racquet sport enthusiasts can sign up to use the racquetball courts at their convenience. And for those who like to work out, the sun-strewn fitness center will feature free weights and hydra-fitness equipment, as well as stationary cycles and ergometers.

"I envision the already-popular fitness center as being twice as popular once it's located in a pleasant environment," predicts Geoff Miller. "Imagine sitting on a life-cycle in front of a large window, and watching the snow fall as you pedal away."

Since every fitness program calls for staying healthy and free from injury, the field house will also function as a "wellness center" for the College community. Teaching space will be provided for classes in nutrition, health, and lifetime fitness. And it seems likely the College's Health Services and infirmary will find their new home there. That way, when students have questions about preventive health care and fitness regimens, they won't have far to go to find the answers they need.

The men's lacrosse team made it to the Division III national playoffs for the fourteenth time in the last 15 years.

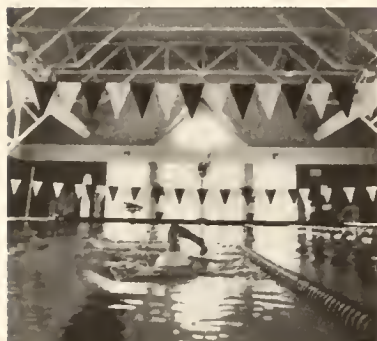

Contenders for the past four years, the men's tennis team finished fourth among Division III schools from all over the United States.

A first-team All-American in women's lacrosse in 1989, Sarah Coste became the first female athlete so honored in her sport.

Sho'man Larry Gewer was a runner-up in the national tennis singles competition. Tracy Peel and Monica Blanco also made it into the national championships.

The first Washington College female ever to make it to a national championship was freshman swimmer Kasey Carroll. She finished 17th in the 1,650-yard freestyle competition.

After just four years of collegiate competition, the women's swimming team placed first in the Maryland State Meet of Division III schools in 1988-89.

A Team Effort

e need your help. Constructing the Lifetime Fitness Center, and renovating the basement of Cain Gymnasium, will cost close to $3.5 million. Trustee William B. Johnson has already pledged $500,000 for the project. The College is turning to foundations and the State of Maryland for further financial support. But it's Washington College alumni who will make or break the project. The College is counting on its alumni to come through with $1 million in contributions, the first time alumni have been asked to support a capital campaign project during the College's Campaign for Excellence.

One million dollars may sound like a formidable challenge. But then, alumni of Washington College, the smallest school in the Middle Atlantic Conference, are used to facing formidable challenges—and coming out on top. By making the Lifetime Fitness Center a reality, you can improve the lives of every Washington College student: from the freshman who enjoys aerobic dance, to the senior who plays two varsity sports.

Want to know more about how your gift to the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center can make a red-letter day for Washington College? In the months ahead, alumni volunteers will contact their classmates to solicit support for this vitally needed new facility. Or if you prefer, you may call F. Passing The Test For Academic Excellence

REPORTS FROM THE OFFICERS OF THE COLLEGE
REPORT OF GIFTS

Passing The Test For Academic Excellence

by Sue De Pasquale '87

One July afternoon, a month before the influx of 235 new freshmen and 600 or so returning students, President Douglass Cater, joined by his loyal deputy, Vice President Sherry Magill, took time out to discuss the College's academic achievements and innovations, and their hopes for its future.

President Cater, fresh from a quasi-sabbatical taken to write his memoirs of his days on the staff of U.S. President Lyndon B. Johnson, talked about the responsibility of a liberal arts college to its students, and what Washington College is doing to fulfill that obligation.

As he begins his eighth year at the helm of this small liberal arts college, President Cater is confident that Washington College is truly rising to the challenges facing small private colleges nationwide.

Q: President Cater, in your inaugural address seven years ago, you talked about the need to broaden one's scope and counter specialization through the liberal arts. Why is this goal so important?

Cater: The objective of a liberal arts college should be to awaken the curiosities and train the minds of students to pursue learning for a lifetime. It should provide a student with enough grounding that he or she can go into any graduate endeavor and move toward any profession or academic discipline that may be desired. The College must also recognize that the larger percentage of students must have a confidence in their capacity to cope with life as generalists — not only cope but to relish life through broadened interests and appreciation of art and music and the life of the mind.

College graduates will enter a society where they may switch careers a number of times, and be confronted with problems that are not contained in any textbook. Education must stimulate the capacity to employ one's brain as a learning instrument. If you don't go on into specialized studies, the precise course content of what you learn here is not going to remain with you for a long time. You will remember favorite books and favorite teachers, but what will stay with you is self-assurance that you can move among the disciplines; that you know how to organize the many learning experiences which you will confront.

When young graduates of Washington College move into esoteric fields in our information society, it proves we are not in a backwater. Here it is possible to gain the ability to cope with rapid change better than in an urban setting within a depersonalized, mega-university. This gives me my fighting faith in the future of the small, liberal arts college, particularly one with the history and the tradition of Washington College.

The college president, in this day and time, has to fight hard not to be turned simply into the chief fundraiser of the college, who does all his work on the road while other people have the joy and privilege of making the difference at the college.

Dr. Sherry Magill (left) and President Douglass Cater work closely together to establish programs that stimulate faculty and students and to bring visitors of note to the campus.

Q: You've launched several programs to encourage continued intellectual endeavors among the College's faculty members. Would you describe one program in particular: the Faculty Enhancement Fund?

Cater: While outside foundations do a great deal with small grants, these grants do not always meet the needs of individual professors at Washington College. We have been able to use discretionary funds—primarily grants from foundations not restricted to specific uses—in order to set up a Faculty Enhancement Fund.

This encourages faculty members—especially those planning the most effective use of the summer break—to undertake projects that are contributory to their areas of interest. We've funded a range of projects, with grants typically running between $1,000 and $2,500. The Provost reviews the applications and I confer with her as final decisionmakers.

Q: Is it similar to a sabbatical?

Cater: A faculty enhancement grant may come in addition to a sabbatical, but it's not intended to buy the leave time of the faculty member. The sabbatical covers the full cost of a faculty member's salary for one semester. We have increased the number of sabbaticals granted every year and hope to have more.

Q: The Wye Faculty Seminar, with its roundtable discussions based on assigned readings, provides another avenue for growth. How long has that program been in operation?

Cater: Under the direction of Dr. Sherry Magill, we've now completed our seventh summer. The idea grew out of a conversation I had with the then-President of Hampden-Sydney College, Josiah Bunting, who now serves on our Board of Visitors and Governors. We felt that small, liberal arts colleges in non-urban settings need to provide faculty intellectual involvements that go beyond the campus. We both had been beneficiaries of the Aspen Institute's seminars. It so happened that the Institute moved its headquarters to the Wye Plantation nearby.

Consequently, we decided to launch an experiment in which we would invite professors from across the disciplines to participate in a weeklong roundtable discussion based upon a set of common readings. We chose "Citizenship in the American Polity" as the theme. It was our firm belief that such a topic lies at the very heart of liberal education—raising questions central to what an undergraduate needs to know in order to be a contributing member of our democratic society.

By the end of this summer, more than 370 professors from 63 small colleges across the nation will have participated. Washington College faculty have benefited in great measure. While the other colleges have been allowed a maximum of two professors each summer, as the founder college we've been sending four or five.

Q: What effect has the experience had on those who participated?

Magill: We hear from professors from a wide variety of institutions who talk about the courses that they're now introducing. Some have chosen to team teach; some have chosen to use the seminar model more frequently than the lecture model.

On our own campus, we've launched a spin-off program for high school teachers in the region. Washington College faculty who participated in the Wye Seminar serve as moderators. So the enrichment goes on. We're hoping to build an important bridge between this College and people who teach at the high school level across the state. The Wye Faculty Seminar has enormous potential, not just in terms of reinvigorating faculty, but in terms of reaching out to others.

Q: The College last year received a $328,000 grant aimed at enabling women and ethnic minorities who are non-traditional students (over age 25) to attend Washington College. What has been the response to this scholarship program?

Cater: That grant from the Jessie Ball duPont Religious, Charitable and Educational Fund has provided a splendid breakthrough. We found from our experience that some of our best students are those who had missed the opportunity to get their degrees when they were younger. These non-traditional students enrich the classroom. We made a determined outreach for scholarship funds sufficiently large that we could attract students less well off than the ones we were already attracting. I've just reviewed those who have been selected for next year. It is a most heartening program. Word has spread and we have had a good number of well-qualified candidates to choose from.

It takes an enormous amount of energy just to brood about the College. It's always somewhere in the back of your mind clicking away.

Q: What other steps is the College taking to attract an ethnically diverse population?

Cater: It is very difficult for an independent, small liberal arts college in this rural setting to bring in more students of ethnic diversity. We need more imaginative ideas of how we can do it, other than offering scholarships so big that these students can't afford not to come. We just don't have that kind of scholarship money. The larger and wealthier universities can always outbid us. This still represents a formidable challenge.

Q: As plans are being firmed up for construction of the new Field House, there has been some discussion about establishing a lifetime fitness center within the building. Do you feel fitness should be an important element in the education of a Washington College student?

Cater: I'm a fitness zealot. In every way that is appealing, we should make the concept of fitness part of our co-curricular and curricular programs. I would favor a well-designed fitness course that is credit-bearing. If it's good enough, it ought to be required as one credit toward graduation.

It's remarkable to me how careless people can be with their physical well-being—smoking, drinking, eating to excess. Fitness is more than avoiding bad habits. It requires developing the habit that you're not satisfied unless you get a certain amount of physical exercise every week. It's a challenge for the College to encourage students to develop eating habits so that growing old and rotund or excessively skinny is not the predictable fate. Physical activity helps you develop a lifestyle in which you handle stress better—the stress of your career and the stress of your family.

Q: Hasn't the growth of the intramural sports program made physical activity more accessible to women, as well as students of both sexes who don't consider themselves competitive athletes?

Cater: Yes. We not only have intramural sports, but this past fall we introduced rec sports, which are less formal than intramurals. Students play touch football out on the campus lawn. Under the direction of Dennis Berry, the program has taken on a life of its own. There's a marked increase in the number of students who engage in some form of recreational or athletic activity.

Kennedy used to quote the ancient Greek saying that "Happiness is the pursuit of excellence in a life affording it scope." That's true for me. The seven years I have spent here have been happy ones. I have felt I was being tested for excellence.

Q: The computer revolution hit WC full force, with faculty and students linked to a network of 248 terminals across campus. How can something as inhuman and technologically advanced as a computer have a place in a college devoted to the liberal arts experience?

Cater: There are at least two ways. One as a facility for better writing; it permits you to edit and rewrite and reorganize so much more easily. It has improved the quality of writing that goes on in almost every form. Secondly, we received a CAPHE grant (Consortium for the Advancement of Private Higher Education) to allow our faculty to develop innovative ways to use the computer in the classroom. I've been fascinated by the excitement of the deans and faculty over making Washington College the model college for the academic uses of the computer. We are now extending this to the automation of the library catalogues.

Magill: We've seen how creative students can become in using the computer. One student started his own magazine with the desktop publishing system.

Cater: We're following the growth curve of the computer. What has been pleasing to me is that after entering at the third generation of computers we have managed to leapfrog to the head of the class.

Q: At a time when other small liberal arts colleges are concerned about declining enrollments, Washington is reporting record-breaking enrollment figures. To what do you attribute this success?

Cater: We keep waiting for the decline to happen, but it hasn't. We did not have the 15 percent fall-off in applicants that occurred in some of the blue-chip colleges this year. This year we had more applications than the year before, even though we've been obliged to maintain a ceiling on our entering freshman class. We've grown in enrollment as much as we can grow, at least for the immediate future.

The College has benefited enormously by the "grapevine." That's probably the best way that people are recruited for college—by word of mouth. And, of course, we have a first-rate admissions department that knows how to do its job.

Q: Do you believe the college president has a role as the intellectual leader of the college community?

Cater: The college president, in this day and time, has to fight hard not to be turned simply into the chief fundraiser of the college, who does all his work on the road while other people have the joy and privilege of making the difference at the college. To achieve the things that an independent college needs takes a lot of money. It doesn't come easy. I have tried to do both—raise the necessary funds while still contributing to the intellectual purposes of the College.

Q: But you do enjoy fundraising to some extent?

Cater: There is a bloodsport thrill of the chase in fundraising. It's like big game hunting—you go out on the trail and look an elephant in the eye and ask him for a million dollars.

Reviewing the list of all the corporations and foundations that have given to Washington College since I've been here, I was amazed at how far-flung our support has been. We've gotten significant grants from foundations and corporations in Texas, Florida, New York, Illinois, California....

Magill: I guess it's a romantic notion, but I lament what's happened with the college presidency in this nation, that he has become the chief fundraiser, when I think one of his primary roles is to be the chief intellectual leader of the institution—the provocateur, the chief innovator.

Q: And you see President Cater as an example of this "chief innovator?"

Magill: Yes. It may be something as simple as the people he brings to campus. That enriches the lives of those students who listen to these folks, who interact with the William Styrons who have been here, the Richard Wilburs, the Toni Morrisons and Lady Bird Johnsons. It's an incredible list of people and it enriches everyone's life intellectually. People talk about those visits for months afterward. Alumni often write to say that was the highlight of their experience at Washington College—their hour with Toni Morrison or with Richard Wilbur.

Cater: I find that this job, as I look back on seven full years, takes something like 35 percent brains and 65 percent energy. It takes an enormous amount of energy just to brood about the College. It's always somewhere in the back of your mind clicking away. You know when it's clicked too much when you wake up at 3 o'clock in the morning and find your brain going around in circles over some particular problem of the day.

It's a real challenge. Kennedy used to quote the ancient Greek saying that "Happiness is the pursuit of excellence in a life affording it scope." That's true for me. The seven years I have spent here have been happy ones. I have felt I was being tested for excellence.

ANNUAL REPORT

From The Office Of The Provost

by Elizabeth R. Baer

Much of the energy of Washington College faculty and administration during academic year 1988-89 was focused on discussion of the many recommendations for curricular change proposed by a faculty and student subcommittee of the Academic Council. Long, sometimes heated, meetings were devoted to discussion of the freshman year experience, advising, the four course plan, and other topics. Inevitably, the relationship between curriculum and faculty workload was a centerpiece of such discussions.

We are in medias res in reviewing the report's 45 recommendations: some, like the proposal for an elaborate required freshman year course, were rejected by faculty; others, such as those regarding advising, and planning the calendar of events, underwent change before approval; yet others, such as the demand for a definition/standard of the expectations of the four course plan, have been implemented; some are yet to be reviewed. All on campus would agree that the discussions were at times inspiring, at times painful, but the very act of such exchange on the policies and principles by which we exist is crucial to a healthy institution.

We have also focused on new initiatives. Among these are the successful inauguration of the William Smith Scholars Program, funded by the Jessie Ball DuPont fund, to bring minorities and women over age 25 to campus as part-time students. The Natural Science Division showed off its new Decker Laboratory Center on Science Information Day, a day-long program to introduce prospective students to faculty and facilities for studying the sciences at Washington College. President Cater created a Fitness Council, chaired by community physician Dr. Virginia Collier and composed of faculty and administration.

Another target of our energies was the on-going tasks and programs which are the responsibility of faculty and the Provost. We have made significant progress toward computerization of Miller Library's card catalog. Several vendors demonstrated their hardware and software to faculty and students during spring term. William Tubbs, Librarian, served as the primary author of a major proposal to the National Endowment for the Humanities for library enrichment; we will learn the outcome of this application in December. On the computing front, Washington College was represented at a major educational computing conference by Reference Librarian Jeff Chaffin, who demonstrated software he created which provides a "tour" of the library. The Academic Computing Committee has submitted a proposal to Apple Computer for the donation of a computer laboratory classroom. And we conducted 11 faculty searches this year, successfully hiring tenure track faculty in business management, drama, psychology, physics, and history, and temporary faculty in philosophy, German, psychology, art history, French, and education.

Despite the full year, faculty planned myriad activities for this summer past. Fourteen faculty from several disciplines attended a seminar on teaching writing, conducted by Dr. Paul Connelly of the Institute of Writing and Thinking at Bard College. Another 12 received support from the Faculty Enhancement Fund to travel, to conduct scientific research, to visit libraries and archives, to attend conferences, and to complete writing projects.

Several science faculty were engaged in staging a two-week seminar for high school chemistry students, supported by the National Science Foundation. Other faculty conducted seminars for Maryland high school teachers, modeled on the Aspen Institute/Wye Faculty Development Project created by President Cater and Board member Josiah Bunting. Richard Gillin, Professor of English, and Director of the Maryland Writing Project, brings high school teachers to campus for a month-long workshop on teaching writing skills. Director of Continuing Education Mary Ellen Larrimore was responsible for the six week Maryland Gifted and Talented Program for junior high and high school students. So, many students and teachers crossed the well-worn brick pathways of the College on warm summer days.

Faculty Achievements

Emilie Amt, assistant professor of history specializing in English political and administrative history of the 12th and 13th centuries, received a faculty enhancement grant to travel this summer to Oxford and London, where she conducted research regarding 12th century finance, royal forests, and effects of warfare.

Elizabeth Baer, provost and professor of English, was a panelist discussing "Cultural Literacy" at the AAC Conference. She guest lectured at various state public libraries and in Columbia, SC, on Eudora Welty, Katherine Paterson, and fairy tales. She also published several reviews of women's literature. She was awarded a Fellowship from Christian A. Johnson Endeavor Foundation to attend a leadership seminar for academic officers, and served as a board member of the Maryland Humanities Council. This summer she worked on a manuscript of a book on Virginia women diarists and did some research for a lecture on children's literature, to be delivered in Hawaii next June.

Kevin M. Brien has been promoted to associate professor of philosophy.

John Conkling, adjunct professor of chemistry, hosted guests from across the country and abroad for two seminars on pyrotechnics at Washington College in August.

Richard Gillin, professor of English, has been nominated to be a judge for the Phoenix Book Award. This summer, he led the Summer Institute for Teachers for the Maryland Writing Project, and served as director of the Children's Writing Institute.

Robert Janson-La Palme, associate professor of art, has been granted a sabbatical leave this fall to accept a position as visiting scholar at the National Portrait Gallery in Washington, D.C. He is completing a book on Charles Willson Peale, which will be part of a series being published by Yale University Press.

Bennett J. Lamond has been promoted to full professor of English.

Gail Kaplan, assistant professor of mathematics, received faculty travel grants to attend a mathematics conference in Orlando, FL, and the Mid-Atlantic Conference on Critical Thinking and College Teaching at Salisbury, MD, where she was a speaker. She also attended a conference on Critical Thinking and Educational Reform at Sonoma State University. She was the featured speaker at the Governor's Academy and at the Maryland State Department of Education's annual conference for mathematics teachers, and conducted workshops for Anne Arundel County mathematics teachers and Suffolk Community College (NY) faculty. This summer, she participated in the Wye Faculty Seminar.

Juan Lin, recently promoted to associate professor of physics, and two students, Justin McIntyre '90 and James Souvlis '92, conducted a summer research project regarding period doubling bifurcations. Their work was supported by a grant from the Research Corporations.

Donald A. Munson has been promoted to full professor of biology.

J. David Newell, professor and chair of the department of philosophy and religion, has been granted a year's sabbatical to accept a position as visiting professor of philosophy at the United States Military Academy at West Point. He was a consultant to the philosophy program at Western Maryland College, and gave biomedical ethics training programs at two Eastern Shore hospitals.

Rosette M. Roat, associate professor of chemistry, was awarded a grant from the National Science Foundation

Young Scholars Program to offer a two-week summer residential program for area high school students. The Forensic Science Project gives advanced high school students a multi-disciplinary experience in forensic chemistry, scientific ethics, psychology, criminalistics and criminology. She also gave a series of lectures in bioinorganic chemistry at Moi University in Eldoret, Kenya, while on a visit this summer.

Joachim J. Scholz, associate professor of German, received a research grant from the Federal Republic of Germany to complete a two-volume edition of letters of the author August Scholtis. He spent two months in West Germany this summer, conducting research at the archives of the State Library of Dortmund.

George R. Shivers, professor of Spanish, has completed a translation from Spanish of a book of essays by Chilean writer Ariel Dorfman, under contract from Duke University Press. The book is tentatively titled The Liberation of the North American Reader. His summer projects included writing on works by Gabriel Garcia Marquez and José Arguedas, and revising a piece on Spanish writer Pedro Antonio de Alaran.

Karen Lynn Smith, associate professor of physical education, was awarded a grant from the Maryland State Board of Education to write a teacher resource manual on dance history for Anne Arundel and Howard counties. This summer, she attended several workshops and conferences related to dance.

Kate Verville, assistant professor of biology, published a paper regarding "The Effect of Free Chlorine on Escherichia coli Populations" in Current Microbiology. This summer, she conducted research on the survival of microbes in drinking water systems. Her research was supported by faculty enhancement funds.

From The Office Of Admissions

by Kevin Coveney, Vice President for Admissions and Enrollment Management

Washington College has experienced another successful year of student recruitment. Of the 10,000+ high school seniors who identified themselves as prospective candidates for admission to the Class of 1993, 1,200 became applicants, 860 were offered admission and 238 enrolled. The 1989 applicant pool was, in fact, the largest in the history of Washington College. During the '70s and early '80s the annual freshman applicant pool averaged 665 students; this year's total represents an 80 percent increase over the most recent ten-year average.

Consistent with the College's enrollment profile throughout most of the '70s and '80s, the Class of 1993 is geographically diverse. Twenty states and two foreign countries are represented in the Class, with 122 (51%) of this year's freshmen coming from Maryland. Other states with double digit student counts include Pennsylvania (19), New York (19), Delaware (14), New Jersey (14), and Virginia (11). The New England region contributed sixteen students or 7% of the Class and was followed in descending order by the Mid-West (7), South (6), and South West (4).

The Class of 1993 has 22 fewer women than last year and ten more men. The number of ethnic minorities, nine, is comparable to last year's class. Enrolling freshmen who attended public secondary schools account for 52% of the Class. As a group, they attained a mean grade point average of 3.15 and a mean SAT score of 1040. Freshmen who attended an independent secondary school had a mean GPA of 2.75 and a mean SAT of 1000. Among the programs most frequently cited as intended fields of study by members of the Class of 1992 were English, business management, pre-med, pre-law, international studies and psychology.

Demographic forecasts indicate a significant decline in the college-bound population over the next five years. In response to the challenges of a shrinking student market, the Admissions Office is seeking to involve a greater number of students, parents, and alumni in the recruitment process. Additional news about the Alumni Admissions Network being established by Assistant Admissions Director Nancy Nunn '79 will be included in future editions of the Washington College Magazine. The College is also taking steps to expand its outreach to minority students. A minority recruiting program being developed by Assistant Admissions Director Kathy Wayne '81 will be in place in time for the Fall '89 recruiting season.

Despite the use of videos, four-color publications, telemarketing, and direct mail, I have found nothing that surpasses the value of "word-of-mouth" publicity. I encourage all alumni and friends of Washington College to follow the excellent example of Louis Goldstein and to share your pride in WC with everyone you meet.

From The Office Of Development

by F. David Wheelan '78, Vice President for Development and College Relations

Each year, we have been happy to report the achievement of new giving levels in Washington College's fundraising campaign. This year is no exception. Total support exceeded all previous records, with more than $5.7 million raised in annual and capital funds. One year and a half after establishing new capital campaign goals of $17.4 million, we are pleased to report Washington College has raised $8.6 million toward Phase II objectives.

Once again, one of the most exciting and no doubt the most reassuring news is the continued success of our annual giving program, the Washington College Fund. The Fund grew by 15 percent in FY 88-89, moving us closer to the $1.1 million mark. Alumni donations climbed by more than 18 percent, and participation in the Fund held steady at a remarkable 51 percent, while many peer institutions lost significant ground on both fronts.

While it will take a few months to see where Washington College stands nationally, we are confident we will once again rank among the top 20 schools in the country in alumni participation. As we learn the results, I will pass them on to you. In the meantime, our hats are off to the more than 100 Washington College Fund volunteers for making this our best year yet.

Paralleling this alumni success story was that of The 1782 Society. Comprised of parents, alumni and friends committed to providing critical leadership to the Washington College Fund through contributions of $1,000 or more, the Society grew to a total of 250 members. This unique collection of donors represents the foundation of financial support for Washington College, and we are forever grateful for their steadfast loyalty and commitment to the College's future.

Equally impressive were the second year results from the College's Campaign for Excellence. As many alumni and friends who have visited Chestertown have surely noticed, fundraising efforts have led to a physical transformation of the campus. To the west, the Casey Academic Resources Center is under construction, and completion is projected by late spring 1990. To the east, the Alonzo G. Decker, Jr. Laboratory Center was dedicated adjacent to Dunning Hall in October. We look forward to the rededication of a renovated Dunning Hall this fall.

At the center of the campus the old boiler plant is being transformed into a creative arts center, while plans are underway for construction of a physical education center next to Cain Gymnasium. We hope to break ground on this latest project in fiscal year 89-90.

Providing the major catalyst for this year's successful capital campaign, the C.V. Starr Foundation pledged $1 million over two years to the Campaign. Obtained with the help of newly appointed Washington College trustee John J. Roberts, Chairman and Chief Executive Officer of American International Underwriters Corporation, the Starr Foundation gift is the largest single gift from a private foundation since the Campaign's inception in 1984. Combined with $665,000 from The Hodson Trust, the Starr Foundation created a challenge fund designed to match future gifts to the Campaign.

Equally exciting this year was the generous $500,000 commitment of trustee William B. Johnson '40 to provide the leadership gift for the new athletic center, to be named the Benjamin A. Johnson Lifetime Fitness Center in memory of his late father, a member of the Class of 1911. As the insert at the center of this Annual Report demonstrates, Bill Johnson has sent College alumni a vigorous challenge to complete funding for this important addition to the campus.

The Development Office looks forward to working with Class Decade Chairmen who will spearhead appeals to all alumni for capital support for this project to meet the Johnson challenge. We hope to have good news to report by the next issue of the Washington College Magazine.

Distinguished photojournalist Constance Stuart Larrabee, through a creative planned giving method, has helped make the conversion of the old campus boiler plant a reality this year. By matching Starr/Hodson funds and joining with other major donors, including Mrs. John Campbell White, the College has nearly completed funding for the creative arts center.

On a less visible, but vitally important front, Washington College raised more than $170,000 in endowment and scholarship funds from friends all over Maryland in February's highly successful Louis L. Goldstein Roast. Featuring political satirist Mark Russell, who was joined in the barbing by Governor William Donald Schaefer, the Roast attracted media attention throughout Maryland and Washington, D.C. Two of the most important forces in the effort were Washington College's own, John Downs '78 and John Moag '76.

Paced by trustee Henry C. Beck, Jr., the academic computing program continues to attract national interest, with additional support coming this year from the Surdna Foundation, the Charles E. Culpeper Foundation, Inc., and the Charles A. Frueauff Foundation. Restricted to computerization of Miller Library, these gifts will enable faculty, students and administrators to access the card catalog system from their personal computers.

The Washington College Magazine continues to win recognition for design and content. I take particular satisfaction in the College's ability to continue to produce stimulating and creative features, as well as highlighting alumni who have used their liberal arts education in a variety of careers.

Under the leadership of President Charles S. "Chuck" Waesche, Jr. '53, the Alumni Council underwent major reorganization this year, with its three branches, Decade Members, Members-at-Large and Alumni Chapter Presidents Association, now responsible for reunion planning, alumni special events and development of new chapters. In addition, two chapters, Baltimore and Kent & Queen Anne's, supported scholarships at the 1782 Society level, and all chapters contributed to the Washington's Birthday Ball Scholarship Fund as patrons.

From the Office of Finance

By Gene A. Hessey, Vice President For Finance And Management

Fiscal year 1988-89 was financially one of the most positive in the history of Washington College. The operating fund was balanced and generated some reserve for future operating requirements. Revenues from all sources either met or exceeded the budget plan and overall revenues were 7.4% above budget forecasts. With the aid of further refinement of the administrative computing system, improved cost control and oversight resulted in expenses being in line with the budget plan. Further, a stable enrollment, increased Federal and State of Maryland support for financial aid, and the outstanding gift response from alumni, foundations, and friends all significantly contributed to the favorable financial results.

Endowment market value at June 20, 1989 increased by 4% to $18.7 million. Endowment income to support the operations of the College also increased by 8% to $1.2 million. Gifts of $305,000 were added to the endowment during the fiscal year. Finally, bequests currently under executor administration will add $400,000 to the endowment fund in the coming year.

Further progress was made in moving faculty compensation to a competitive position with comparable colleges. Benefits for both faculty and staff were significantly improved during the year. A pension plan is now in place for all College employees. Life insurance and disability coverage have also been provided. We also averted a major cost increase for medical insurance by installing a new group health plan. A complete review of personnel policies was conducted during the year and a new employee policy manual was reviewed, approved, and distributed to all employees.

A restructuring of the College's bonded indebtedness was accomplished during the year, taking advantage of lower interest rates on tax exempt financing. Additional funds were included in the refinancing for the acquisition cost of the last undeveloped parcel of land adjacent to College property, the development costs for new student housing, and funds for the further development of the campus master plan. This restructuring did not increase the annual debt retirement costs.

The positive results for fiscal year 1989 set a challenging tone and pace for the year ahead as the College moves toward the next decade.

George Washington Society

The Board of Visitors and Governors has created the George Washington Society to ensure that future leaders of Washington College will have the financial resources to provide excellent educational opportunities for students. Membership in the George Washington Society allows Washington College to recognize those alumni, faculty and friends who have made a bequest or planned gift to the College. Members receive a Scroll of Membership, and their names will be inscribed on the George Washington Society Roll of Honor, to be displayed at the College.

D O N O R ' S P R O F I L E :

JOHN A. MOAG, JR.

CLASS: 1977.

HOME: Baltimore, Maryland.

PROFESSION: Lawyer and Partner, Patton, Boggs and Blow. Lobbyist on Capitol Hill.

PROFILE: His legal opponents call him aggressive. His clients call him successful. A loyal family man, he spends weekends with his wife and kids on their Gettysburg farm.

MOST INTERESTING PROJECT: Lobbying Congress for $54 million to support development of the proposed $200 million Christopher Columbus Center for Marine Research and Exploration in Baltimore's Inner Harbor.

BEST COLLEGE MEMORY: "Our kidnapping of the statue of George Washington ... the one they put up for the Birthday Ball. We hid it in a deserted barn and demanded of the president that he raise a ransom to be contributed to the library. No one ever knew it was us ... until now."

GIVING LEVEL: 1782 Society.

WHY I GIVE: "I benefited tremendously from my education at Washington College. I like to think I'm a better lawyer and citizen today because I studied philosophy, sociology, foreign language and science."

WHY OTHERS SHOULD GIVE: "It's a matter of personal responsibility. All of us should give back a little of what we received — whether it's to our parents or to our schools."
